Rolvaag

Giants in the earth

STORAGE

PUBLIC LIBRARY
FORT WAYNE AND ALLEN COUNTY, IND.

DO NOT REMOVE CARDS FROM POCKET

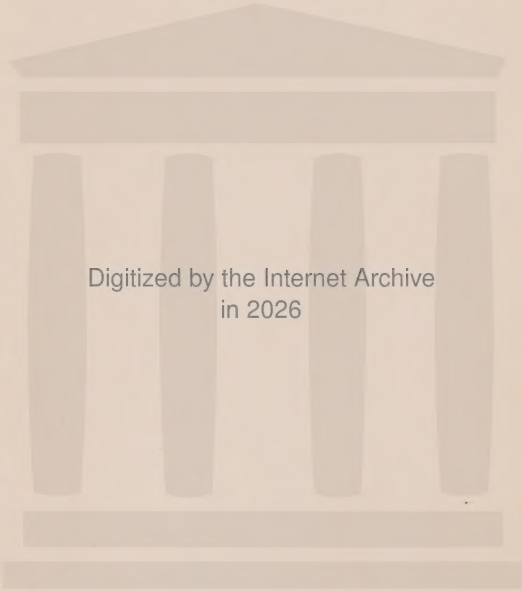
STO
ALLEN COUNTY PUBLIC LIBRARY
3 1833 00588 9685



Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2026

https://archive.org/details/giantsinearth0000oero_c9t6

GIANTS IN THE EARTH

"There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown."

GENESIS VI: 4

Harper's Modern Classics

GIANTS IN THE EARTH

BY

O. E. RÖLVAAG

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY VERNON L. PARRINGTON
Late Professor of English University of Washington

HARPER & BROTHERS PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK AND LONDON

GIANTS IN THE EARTH

COPYRIGHT, 1927, 1929, BY HARPER & BROTHERS

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

H-I

All rights in this book are reserved. It may not be used for dramatic, motion- or talking-picture purposes without written authorization. Nor may the text or part thereof be reproduced in any manner whatsoever without permission in writing from Harper & Brothers.

TO THOSE OF MY PEOPLE WHO TOOK PART IN THE GREAT SETTLING, TO THEM AND THEIR GENERATIONS
I DEDICATE THIS NARRATIVE

1640943

CONTENTS

EDITOR'S INTRODUCTION ix

FOREWORD xxi

INTRODUCTION xxiii

BOOK I: THE LAND-TAKING

TOWARD THE SUNSET 3

HOME-FOUNDING 22

"ROSIE!—ROSIE!" 62

WHAT THE WAVING GRASS REVEALED 110

FACING THE GREAT DESOLATION 156

THE HEART THAT DARED NOT LET IN THE SUN 197

BOOK II: FOUNDING THE KINGDOM

ON THE BORDER OF UTTER DARKNESS 249

THE POWER OF EVIL IN HIGH PLACES 295

THE GLORY OF THE LORD 354

THE GREAT PLAIN DRINKS THE BLOOD OF CHRISTIAN MEN AND IS SATISFIED 424

EDITOR'S INTRODUCTION

THE dramatic contrast between Per Hansa, type of the natural pioneer who sees the golden light of promise flooding the wind-swept plains, and Beret, child of an old folk civilization who hungers for the home ways and in whose heart the terror of loneliness gathers, penetrates to the deeper reality of life as it was lived for three hundred years on the American frontier. It is not a late or rare phenomenon; it is only late and rare in literature. We have been used to viewing the frontier in broad and generous perspective and have responded most sympathetically to the epic note that runs through the tale of the conquest of the continent. It is the great American romance that gives life and drama to our history. It was this epic quality that de Tocqueville felt when he discovered the poetry of America in the silent march of a race toward the far-off Pacific, hewing its way triumphantly through forests and mountains to arrive at its objective. But the emotional side, the final ledger of human values, we have too little considered—the men and women broken by the frontier, the great army of derelicts who failed and were laid away, like the Norse immigrant lad, in forgotten graves. The cost of it all in human happiness—the loneliness, the disappointments, the renunciations, the severing of old ties and quitting of familiar places, the appalling lack of those intangible cushions for the nerves that could not be transported on horseback or in prairie schooners: these imponderables too often have been left out of the reckoning in our traditional romantic interpretation. But with the growth of a maturer realism we are beginning to understand how great was the price exacted by the frontier; and it is because Giants in the Earth, for the first time in our fiction, evaluates adequately the settlement in terms of emotion, because it penetrates to the secret inner life of men and women who undertook the heavy work of subduing the wilderness, that it is—quite apart from all artistic values—a great historical document.

If in one sense the conquest of the continent is the great American epic, in another sense it is the great American tragedy. The vastness of the unexplored reaches, the inhospitality of the wilderness, the want of human aid and comfort when disaster came, these were terrifying things to gentle souls whom fate had not roughhewn for pioneering. Fear must have been a familiar visitor to the heart of the pioneer woman, and for a hundred and fifty years this fear of the dark wilderness was one reason why the settlements clung to the more hospitable seaboard. There, at least, was an outlook toward the old home. But with the crossing of the Allegheny Mountains, following the Revolutionary War, the frontier spirit came into its own. A spirit of restlessness took possession of men, and the thin line of settlements advanced swiftly, overrunning the Inland Empire with its interminable forests and malarial swamps, sprawling rudely from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. To subdue the land was no easy task. Upon the old and the weak the wilderness laid a ruthless hand, and even of the strength of the young it took heavy toll. Tragedy was always lurking at the door of the backwoods cabin. In Beveridge's Life of Lincoln there is a grim story of the hardships suffered by the Lincoln family in Indiana that leaves no room for romance—husband, wife, two children, and later an old couple, were forced to pig together all winter in a brush camp open on one side to the weather, with only a fire in front for cooking and heating—a mode of life below that of the Indian in his skin teepee. And then a mysterious disease fell upon them, virulent and fateful, and the old couple were taken from their cots on the ground and put away beneath the soil to find what rest they might there. That men should break and women go mad under such strain is no more than may be expected of human nature. Beret, the wife of Per Hansa, brooding in her sod-hut in Dakota, afraid of life and of her own thoughts, and turning for comfort to a dark religion, is a type of thousands of frontier women who—as the historian Rid-path said of his parents—"toiled and suffered and died that their children might inherit the promise."

Very likely we should have felt the tragedy of the frontier long ago if we had been as much concerned with inner experience as with outward act, if we had been psychologists as well as chroniclers. But we have been too prone to romanticize the objective reality and disguise slatternly ways with the garb of backwoods independence. The realistic eighteenth century made no such mistake. Such infrequent glimpses of the first frontier that we catch in our early literature suggest a swift descent into grossness as the settlements were left behind. In the Journal of Madam Sarah Knight, which dates from the opening years of the eighteenth century, are brief notes of what fell under her sharp eyes on a horseback trip from Boston to New York. The sketches she has penciled are far from bucolic. Certain of the figures that emerge casually from her pages are no other than decivilized grotesques—animal-like creatures for whom returning to a state of nature meant living filthily in mean huts, traveling back centuries toward the primitive ways of the cavemen. Of the emotional reactions of these early children of the wilderness Madam Knight tells us nothing; so casual an observer would have no opportunity to penetrate beneath the unlovely surface.

A quarter century later Colonel William Byrd, the first gentleman of Virginia, wrote his graphic History of the Dividing Line, an account of a boundary survey run between the colonies of Virginia and South Carolina. As the survey leaves the seacoast behind and approaches the frontier, the same characteristics appear that Madam Knight noted—a rough and surly independence, a dislike of established law and order, and a shiftless way of life that is content to subsist off the country. "Lubberland," Colonel Byrd called the Carolina backwoods where a new race of poor whites was springing up—a rude decivilized existence that bore heavily on the women and was heedless of the common amenities of social life. In Letters from an American Farmer (1773) written by St. John de Crèvecœur, a cultivated Norman who established himself in the colonies after serving in the French army under Montcalm, the same sharp judgment is passed on the frontier. Crèvecœur was of the romantic school of Rousseau and eloquent in praise of life lived close to nature, yet even he discovers the frontier to be a blot on colonial civilization, the abode of rude and lawless figures who precede by a decade the sober army of occupation.

In the eighteenth century the testimony is clear that the frontiersmen—or "borderers," as they were commonly called—were rough bumptious fellows who fled the settlements partly because of a dislike of ordered and seemly ways. The colonial gentry, men like the Rev. Timothy Dwight, held them in deep contempt and rejoiced when they quitted the settlements and plunged deep into the wilderness beyond the jurisdiction of church and state. Lawlessness, shiftlessness, a passion like Jurgen's to follow after their own wishes and their own desires, seem to have been the characteristics of these rude men and slatternly women, as the aristocratic eighteenth century judged them. That is very far from the whole story, to be sure. Our later historians have made clear that from this same leveling frontier issued the spirit of American democracy, and that from these rough individualists came the great movement of Jacksonianism that swept away the class distinctions of an earlier century. Accepting so much, and recognizing the part played by the frontier in shaping the institutions and the psychology of America, it remains true, nevertheless, that the lot of the backwoodsman was hard and the price he paid in civilization for his freedom was great. The sod house of the Dakota plains was only a late adaptation of the primitive huts that were strung along the earlier frontier. What loneliness filled the hearts of the drab women who made hoecakes and dressed deer skins, what rebellions at their lot stirred dumbly within them, no record remains to tell and no literature has cared to concern itself about.

It was not till the nineteenth century that authentic accounts of the frontier, written by men who had come out of it, began to appear, yet even then in too scant volume. In

Editor's Introduction

Longstreet's Georgia Scenes, Joseph G. Baldwin's Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi, and Davy Crockett's Autobiography, the frontier is painted in homely colors that time cannot fade. Their brisk pages seem to have been flipped in the butternut dye-pot of the backwoods cabin. By far the most significant of them is the braggart but naïvely truthful narrative of the life of Cane-brake Davy who in his several removals followed the advancing frontier the length of the State of Tennessee. Davy would seem to have been the authentic backwoodsman, and the life of the individual may be taken as a description of the genus. Restless, assertive, unsocial, buoyantly optimistic and obsessed with the faith that better land lay farther west, cultivating a bumptious wit that was a defense mechanism against the meanness of daily life, he was only an improvident child who fled instinctively from civilization. As a full-length portrait of the Jacksonian leveler, in the days when the great social revolution was establishing the principles of an equalitarian democracy, the picture is of vast significance. But it is incomplete. Concerning the wife and daughters who were dragged at his heels in the successive removals, the narrative is silent. It is a man's tale, unenriched by the emotional experiences of a woman, and as such it tells only half the story of the frontier.

The Autobiography was the last pungent note of realism before the romantic revolution swept over American literature; and it was not till two generations later, when the war was over and the glories of the Gilded Age were fading, that the frontier came to realistic expression again in the works of Hamlin Garland. Main-Travelled Roads, the first chapter in the tale of the Middle Border, is a prologue to Giants in the Earth, telling the story of the prairie settlement in the idiom of the generation that undertook the great adventure. In these brief tales is compressed the harsh temper of the eighties, when the spirit of revolt was running like wildfire across the prairies and the Middle Border was arming for battle. For a decade or more the farmers' affairs had been out of kilter, and a note of discontent had begun to appear in fiction. Before Garland, western life had been dealt with by Edward Eggleston in The Hoosier Schoolmaster and The Circuit Rider, and more searchingly by Ed Howe in The Story of a Country Town—a drab commentary on life in Atchison, Kansas, in the early 'eighties. But it is in Joseph Kirkland's Zury, The Meanest Man in Spring County (1887), that a deep sense of the meanness of frontier life is first adequately felt. The harsh constrictions of pioneer existence tightened about Zury as a boy when his father was struggling with debt, turning a naturally generous nature into a skinflint mortgage grabber. He early learned that he must fight to survive, and as a result his life was shut up in a narrow round of sordid accumulation. It was the poverty of the frontier in Kirkland's eyes, that was the great hardship.

Hamlin Garland's more adequate story of the Middle Border, beginning militantly with Main-Travelled Roads (1887-92) and flowering in the idyllic saga of the Garlands and McClintocks (1914), is a chronicle that grows more significant as the times it deals with draw farther into the past. Throughout his interpretation run two dominant notes: the promise of future fulfillment when the prairies have been brought under the plow—the Per Hansa note of pioneer optimism; and then later, rising slowly into a ground swell, a note of discouragement suggesting the utter futility of a laborious existence. Underlying Main-Travelled Roads is a mood of bitterness that springs from a deep sense of failure—a mood that grew harsher with the economic depression of the Middle Border in the 'eighties. The harvest was not fulfilling the expectations of seed time, and the bow of promise was gone from the prairie fields. The figures of bitter men and despondent women fill his pages and darken the colors of his realism. It is the cost of it all that depresses him—the toll exacted of human happiness. These early studies of Garland's strike the first note of the tragedy of the frontier. Starkly objective, they are sociological sketches, the militant expression of a rebellious mood that had been deepening since the panic of 1873 burst the romantic bubble of frontier hopes. The history of two decades of economic maladjustment, with their Granger Populism, their passionate resentment at the favoritisms of government, their blind striking out at the plutocracy that was visibly rising amid the American democracy, is compressed within a few acrid tales that proposed to tell the plain truth about life on the Middle-Border farm. Main-Travelled Roads is as complete an expression of the mood of the last years of the century—the outlook upon life, the economic and political problems, the objective treatment of materials—as Giants in the Earth is an expression of the vastly different outlook and mood of our own day.

For a generation before 1917, when the movement was brought to a sudden stop, the mind of America was deeply concerned with problems of sociology. The growing spirit of realism was absorbed in politics and economics and concerned itself little with subjective analysis. The intellectuals were busily examining the Constitution in the light of its economic origins and interpreting American history in the light of frontier experience. The novelists, reflecting the current interests, were fascinated by the phenomena of industrialism and were studying curiously the new race of captains of industry who were weaving a strange pattern of life for America. The city had already come to dwarf the country. Chicago bestrode the Middle Border like a colossus, and the novelists found material for their realism in the cut-throat ways of business men. Their stories—harsh and strident as the grinding wheels on the overhead "Loop"—were set against a background of sprawling cities hastening to grow big, where the battles of giants were fought and where the milieu—a vast network of impersonal forces—was more significant than the individual men and women who were borne onward in the stream of tendency to submerge or rise as chance determined. A note of stark determinism runs through much of the work; but it was a determinism of environing forces—the objective world of the machine—rather than of character, and in consequence the deeper concern of fiction was sociological, the understanding of this impersonal machine order and the subduing of it to democratic ends. In such a world the farmer and the problems of the Middle Border were become as old-fashioned as ox-carts.

Ten years later, when Giants in the Earth was published such objective treatment of materials was no longer the vogue. Since the war a revolutionary shift of interest has taken place, a shift from the sociological to the psychological. It is no longer the world of objective fact that obtrudes as the significant reality, but the subtler world of emotional experience, the furtive inner life of impulse and desire that Sherwood Anderson probes so curiously. The change of theme was first marked, perhaps, by Spoon River Anthology with its mordant sketches of stunted and thwarted lives that Mr. Masters professes to regard as the natural harvest of a sterile village life. Spoon River Anthology is bitter in its sardonic rebellion against the genial optimisms of the "Valley of Democracy." From the epic thrust of expansion issued as its natural progeny, a race of abortive grotesques, starved figures which suggest to Mr. Masters the cost in human values of severing the ties of kin and kind and throwing aside like an old shoe the creative wealth of social experience. The soil of the frontier village is too thin for men and women to strike deep root and grow to generous stature.

Since the publication of Spoon River Anthology, concern for psychological values has pretty much taken possession of our literature. In the lovely pages of Willa Cather's O Pioneers! and My Antonia there is revealed a warm sympathy with the emotional life of pioneer women and a poignant understanding of their bleak lot. But the analysis—as in Hamlin Garland's work—draws back from the threshold of final tragedy, pausing before it has penetrated to the hidden core of futility. The waste of all finer values exacted by the prairies is suggested by the queer figures of lonely immigrants who fade in the uncongenial environment, but it is not thrust into the foreground to dominate the scene. The vast stretches of the prairies are there—stern, inhospitable, breeding a dumb homesickness in alien hearts—where the red grass bends before the restless winds and the forces of nature are not easily tamed; but in the end the prairie is subdued and the scars it has laid on men's lives are forgotten. Since Willa Cather, others have dealt with the West—Ruth Suckow, Margaret Wilson, and Herbert Quick, to name a few—yet in none of their work is there the profound insight and imaginative grasp of the theme that gives to Giants in the Earth so great a sense of tragic reality.

In this creative return to the theme of the great American adventure the causes of human failure lie deeper than politics or economics. They are to be found in the impersonal forces of nature that are too powerful for the human will to cope with; and in the hidden weakness of fearful souls that cannot live when their roots have been pulled up from the congenial home soil. For all his titanic labors, Per Hansa, the viking, is struck down at last. There are few nobler passages in our fiction—the more telling for its restraint—than the final scene where, driven inexorably by circumstance, Per Hansa sets forth into the February blizzard to fetch a minister to the bedside of his stricken comrade. The note of determinism is there, subtle, pervasive. The Norns of his fathers had decreed that it should be so—in the urgings of the mystical Beret, in the dumb pleadings of the dying Hans Olsa and his broken-hearted wife. Per Hansa the strong, the capable one who never failed, who was cunning enough to outwit fate itself—Per Hansa would go out into the storm and return with the minister who would point the way to heaven to the troubled Hans Olsa. And so, driven by all the imperatives of fate, he sets out, skis on his feet and others at his back, to face the last great adventure. The blinding snow quickly wraps him about, the cold grips his heart, and Per Hansa is seen no more until on a soft May day, when the wheat is green in his fields and the corn is ready for planting, he is found seated by a haystack, his skis beside him and his face turned to the untrodden West. For all the heroic labors of Per Hansa, for all the tragic loneliness of Beret, the end is futility.

And Beret, the sick one, likewise is in the hands of the Norns. She had sinned through love of Per Hansa, and in the long brooding hours on the Dakota plains her mind gives way. She cannot rise to Per Hansa's delight in the newborn son. Peder Victorious—symbol of Per Hansa's buoyant faith—for her is only another evidence of sin. This dark land of Dakota is marked by God's displeasure, and life for her becomes a silent struggle of renunciation and atonement. A primitive Norse Calvinist, victimized by a brooding imagination that sees more devils than vast hell can hold, she dwells "on the border of utter darkness" where the forces of good and evil struggle for the human soul. Across the gloomy Puritanism of her nature fall the shadows of an older and darker faith, and in her nostalgia the old Northland superstitions merge with the somber Northland religion to her undoing. The tragedy of Beret works itself out in the tender corridors of her own heart and, as Professor Commager has suggested, it is as universal as the tragedy of Goethe's Margarete. In his portrayal of the "sick soul" of Beret hungering for the far homeland the Norse artist has achieved a triumph. The epic conquest of the continent must be read in the light of women's sufferings as well as in that of men's endurance. In whichever light it is read, it becomes something far more suggestive than a drab tale of frontier poverty or a sordid tale of frontier exploitation; it becomes vital and significant as life itself.

Giants in the Earth is a great and beautiful book that suggests the wealth of human potentialities brought to America year after year by the peasant immigrants who pass through Ellis Island and scatter the length and breadth of the land. Written in Norwegian, and stemming from a rich old-world literary tradition, it is at the same time deeply and vitally American. The very atmosphere of the Dakota plains is in its pages, and it could have been written only by one to whom the background was a familiar scene. The artist has lived with these peasant folk; he is one of them, and he penetrates sympathetically to the simple kindly hearts hidden to alien eyes by the unfamiliar folk ways. To gather up and preserve in letters these diverse folk strains before they are submerged and lost in the common American mores, would seem to be a business that our fiction might undertake with profit.

Ole Edvart Rölvaag is himself a viking of the Per Hansa strain. Born of fisher folk, 22 April, 1876, on the island of Dönna at the very edge of the Arctic circle, he took his name, following a common Norwegian custom, from the name of a cove on the shores of which he was brought up. It is a land barren except for the gorse and heather, and the long winter nights and the restless sea were certain to bring the imagination under their somber spell. At the age of fourteen, discouraged from further schooling by the family that contrasted him unfavorably with a brilliant brother, he turned fisherman, and for five years went off to the Lofoten Islands some two hundred miles away for the winter catches. Distrustful of the future, he made his great decision to come to America, landing in New York in 1896 with only a railway ticket to South Dakota. In the great West, still turmoiled by the agrarian upheaval of the 'nineties, he joined an uncle who had provided him transportation money, tried his hand at farming, worked at other jobs, and at the age of twenty-three, not having found himself, he turned once more to the formal business of schooling. In the fall of 1899 he entered Augustana College, a preparatory school in Canton, South Dakota. From there he went to St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minnesota, graduating in 1905 at the age of twenty-eight. After a year at the University of Oslo in Norway, he joined the staff of St. Olaf College, where he is now Professor of Norwegian Literature. In the larger sense, however, his education has been gotten from life which he seems to have lived with a rich and daring intensity; and it is his own venturesome experience, certainly, that finds expression in the creative realism and brooding imagination of his work. Intellectually and artistically he is of the excellent old-world culture. How greatly his professional studies determined his literary technique only a competent Norwegian critic can judge; yet it is worth while comparing Giants in the Earth with Johan Bojer's The Emigrants—a work which, when announced as being in preparation, dramatically influenced his own novel. Appended is a bibliography of the writings of Rölvaag, together with titles dealing with his life and work.

VERNON LOUIS PARRINGTON.
The University of Washington

FOREWORD

In offering this novel to the English-reading public, I feel the need of an explanation. Book I of Giants In The Earth was published in Norway (Aschehoug & Co.) as a separate volume, in October, 1924; Book II, one year later.

I am aware of the slight similarity existing between Johan Bojer's The Emigrants and certain portions of the First Book of my novel; and lest the reader should consider me guilty of having plagiarized him, I find it necessary to offer the information that The Land-Taking was in the hands of the Norwegian book dealers a little better than one month before Bojer's book appeared. In a letter to me, dated January 11, 1925, Mr. Bojer writes: "It certainly was fortunate for me that I got my book finished when I did. Had it appeared much later, I should have been accused of having plagiarized you."

The work of translating this novel has been a difficult task. The idiom of the characters offered serious problems. These settlers came from Nordland, Norway; and though the novel is written in the literary language of Norway, the speech of the characters themselves naturally had to be strongly colored by their native dialect; otherwise their utterances would have sounded stilted and untrue. To get these people to reveal clearly and effectively their psychology in English speech seemed at times impossible; for the idioms of a dialect are well-nigh untranslatable. A liberal use of footnotes was unavoidable.

If the old saying, that many cooks spoil the broth, is true, then surely the English text cannot be of much account; for many have worked at it. The following friends have helped with the translation: Mr. Ansten Anstensen, Columbia University; Miss Ruth Lima, Concordia College, Moorhead, Minnesota; Dr. Nils Flaten, Miss Nora Solum, Prof. Olav Lee, Miss Esther Gulbrandsen—all four of whom are fellow teachers in St. Olaf College; and Atty. John Heitmann, Duluth, Minnesota. I feel also greatly indebted to Dr. and Mrs. Clarence Berdahl, University of Illinois, for their many valuable suggestions and corrections. What I asked of these friends was a literal translation. They complied so willingly and so cheerfully. I take this opportunity to thank them all!

But most of all do I owe gratitude to my friend Lincoln Colcord, Minneapolis, Minnesota, who unified and literally rewrote the English text. As I got the translation from the others, I would wrestle with it for a while, and then send it on to him. When he had finished a division he and I would come together to work it over, he reading the manuscript aloud, I checking with the text of the original. How intensely we struggled with words and sentences! It would happen frequently that several pages had to be rewritten. But he never tired. His has been a real labor amoris. Were it not for his constant encouragement and for his inimitable willingness to help, this novel would most likely never have seen the light of day in an English translation.

St. Olaf College,
Northfield, Minnesota.
July 15, 1927.

O. E. Rölvaag.

INTRODUCTION

I

IT IS a unique experience, all things considered, to have this novel by O. E. Rölvaag, so palpably European in its art and atmosphere, so distinctly American in everything it deals with. Translations from European authors have always been received with serious consideration in the United States; in Rölvaag we have a European author of our own—one who writes in America, about America, whose only aim is to tell of the contributions of his people to American life; and who yet must be translated for us out of a foreign tongue. I think I am right in stating that this is the first instance of the kind in the history of American letters.

There are certain points of technique and construction which show at a glance that the author of this book is not a native American. Rölvaag is primarily interested in psychology, in the unfolding of character; the native American writer is primarily interested in plot and incident. Rölvaag is preoccupied with the human cost of empire building, rather than with its glamour and romance. His chief character, Beret, is a failure in terms of pioneer life; he aims to reveal a deeper side of the problem, by showing the distress of one who could not take root in new soil. Beret's homesickness is the dominant motif of the tale. Even Per Hansa, the natural-born pioneer, must give his life before the spirit of the prairie is appeased. This treatment reflects something of the gloomy fatalism of the Norse mind; but it also runs close to the grim reality of pioneering, a place the bravest art would want to occupy. Giants In The Earth never turns aside from the march of its sustained and inevitable tragedy. The story is told almost baldly at times, but with an unerring choice of simple human detail.

When we lay it down we have gained a new insight into the founding of America.

II

Ole Edvart Rölvaag was born April 22, 1876, in a small settlement on the island of Dönna, in the district of Helgeland, just south of where the Arctic Circle cuts the coast of Norway. The place is far up in the Nordland. Strictly speaking, the settlement has no name; the cove where it lies is called Rölvaag on the map, but it is merely an outskirt of one of the voting precincts on the island. Rölvaag, it will be seen, took his place name after coming to America; he has explained this practice in a footnote in the present work. His father's Christian name was Peder, and in Norway he would have been Pedersen; his own sons, in turn, would have been Olsen. The name is pronounced with umlauted ö rolled a little, as in world; the last syllable, aag, is like the first syllable in auger.

All the people in this settlement were fishermen. In summer they fished in small open boats, coming home every night; in winter they went in larger boats, carrying crews of from four to six men, to the historic fishing grounds off the Lofoten Islands, where the Maelstrom runs and the coast stretches away to North Cape and beyond. It was a life full of hardship and danger, with sorrow and poverty standing close at hand. The midnight sun shone on them for a season; during the winter they had the long darkness. The island of Dönna is a barren rock covered with gorse and heather—hardly a tree in sight. It looks like a bit of the coast of Labrador. An opening between low ledges of granite marks the cove named Rölvaag; at the head of the cove the houses of the settlement stand out stark and unprotected against the sky line. Behind them loom the iron mountains of the coast. A gloomy, desolate scene—a perilous stronghold on the fringe of the Arctic night. There Rölvaag's forebears had lived, going out to the fisheries, since time immemorial.

His father, who is still alive, is the image of a New England sea captain. The family must have been a remarkable one. An uncle, his father's brother, had broken away from the fishing life and made himself a teacher of prominence in a neighbouring locality. An older brother had the mind of a scholar; but something happened—he went on with the fishing, and died long ago. There was a brilliant sister, also, who died young. These two evidently overshadowed Rölvaag while he was growing up; his case as a child seemed hopeless—he could not learn. Nevertheless, he had a little schooling, mostly of a semireligious nature. The school lay seven miles away, across the rocks and moors; that gave him a fourteen-mile walk for his daily education. He went to school nine weeks a year, for seven years. This ended at the age of fourteen, when his father finally told him that he was not worth educating. That was all the schooling he had in Norway.

Once during the period of childhood he was walking in the dusk with his mother; they had been gathering kelp on the rocks which they boiled and fed to the cattle; and now they were on their way home. His mother took him by the hand and asked him what he wanted to be when he grew up. "I want to be a poet," he told her. This was the only time he ever revealed himself to a member of his family. He remembers the quiet chuckle with which his mother received the news; she did not take him to task, nor try to show him how absurd it was, but she couldn't restrain a kindly chuckle as they went along the rock path together. That winter they had only potatoes and salt herring to eat, three times a day; his mother divided the potatoes carefully, for there were barely enough to go around.

In place of education was the reading—for this was a reading family. The precinct had a good library, furnished by the state. Rölvaag had learned to read after a long struggle, and his head was always in a book. The first novel he ever read was Cooper's The Last of the Mohicans in the Norwegian. All of Cooper's novels followed, and the novels of Dickens and Captain Marryat and Bulwer-

Lytton. Then came the works of Ingemann, the Danish historical novelist; the works of Zakarias Topelius, the great Swedish romanticist; the works of the German, Paul Heyse; and the complete works of their own great novelists, especially Björnson and Jonas Lie. For miscellaneous reading there were such things as the tales of Jules Verne and H. Rider Haggard and Alexandre Dumas, Carlyle's The French Revolution, and Stanley's Across the Dark Continent. Neither did they lack the usual assortment of dime novels and shilling-shockers, in paper covers. The list could be extended indefinitely; the parallel with the reading of the better-class American boy of a generation ago is little short of astonishing.

This reading, promiscuous but intensive, lasted through the period of his youth. Once it was rumoured that at a certain village, fourteen miles away, a copy of Ivanhoe could be obtained; Rölvaag set out on foot to get it, and was gone two days on the journey. There is another incident, slight but deeply revealing, which shows the promise wrapped up in the husk of boyhood. In a moment of exaltation he decided to write a novel of his own. He may have been eleven or twelve when this creative impulse seized him. All one afternoon he spent in his bedroom writing; with infinite labour he had completed as many as five pages of the novel. Then his elder brother, who shared the room with him, came in—the brilliant brother of whom he stood in awe. "What are you doing there?" asked the brother. "Nothing," Rölvaag answered, hastily trying to conceal the fruits of his first literary effort. "Let me see it!"—the brother had quickly sensed what was going on. "I won't!" And so the battle had started—a terrific struggle that nearly wrecked the room, in the course of which the five pages were torn to shreds. But the brother had not seen a word of them. Rölvaag never attempted literary composition again until he was completing his education in America, fifteen years afterward.

Awhile later we find him reading Cooper and Marryat aloud to the fishermen at Lofoten, during the winter lay-up;

there was a splendid library at this remote station, too, maintained by the state for the use of the fishing fleet. By this time Rölvaag had become a fisherman himself, like everyone else in the community. He went on his first trip to the Lofoten fishing grounds at the age of fifteen. In all, he fished five years, until he had just passed twenty. Every year he was growing more discontented. In the winter of 1893 a terrible storm devastated the fishing fleet, taking tragic toll among his friends and fellow fishermen. The boat he sailed in escaped only by a miracle. This experience killed his first romantic love of the fishing life; he sat down then and wrote to an uncle in South Dakota, asking him for a ticket to the United States. Not that he felt any particular call to go to America; he only thought of getting away. He longed for the unknown and untried—for something secret and inexpressible. Vaguely, stubbornly, he wanted the chance to fulfil himself before he died. But the uncle, doubtless influenced by Rölvaag's family reputation, refused to help him; and the fishing life went on.

Two more years passed, years of deepening revolt—when suddenly the uncle in South Dakota changed his mind. One day a ticket for America arrived. The way of escape was at hand.

Then a dramatic thing happened. All the fishermen went to the summer fair at the market town of Björn. At this fair, boats were exposed for sale, the finest fishing craft in all Norway. Rölvaag's master sought him out and took him down among the boats. His admiration for this master was extravagant; he speaks of him to-day as a sea king, the greatest human being he has ever known. The man led him directly to the best boat hauled out on the beach. They stood admiring her. He led him aft, under her stern, where they could see her beautiful lines. He patted her side as he spoke. He said: "If you will send back the ticket to your uncle, I will buy this boat for you. You shall command her; and when she has paid for herself she shall be yours."

The offer swept him off his feet. Never, he affirms, can he hope to attain in life again a sensation of such complete and triumphant success as came to him at that moment. A new boat, the backing of the man he admired and loved above all others, a place at the top of his profession at the age of twenty, a chance to reign supreme in his little world. And yet, nothing beyond—it meant that this was all. To live and die a fisherman. No other worlds—the vague, beautiful worlds beyond the horizon. "I will have to think it over," was his answer. He turned away, went up on a hillside above the town, and sat there alone all the afternoon.

This young man of twenty sitting on a hillside on the coast of Norway, wrestling with his immense problem, takes on the stature of a figure from the sagas. Which way will he make up his mind? "It was a fine, clear day in Nordland," he tells me, speaking of the incident thirty years afterward. A fine, clear day—he could see a long way across the water. But not the shape of his own destiny. The life he knew was calling him with a thousand voices. How could he have heard the hail of things not yet seen? Where did he get the strength to make his momentous decision? He came down from the hillside at last, and found his master. "I am sorry," he said, "but I cannot accept your offer. I am going to America."

III

Rölvaag himself has told about the journey in his first book, Amerika-Breve (Letters from America), published in 1912, a work which is largely autobiographical and which struck home in a personal way to his Norwegian-American readers. He landed in New York in August of 1896. He was not even aware that he would require money for food during the railway trip; in his pocket were an American dime and a copper piece from Norway. For three days and nights, from New York to South Dakota, he lived on a single loaf of bread; the dime went for tobacco somewhere along the vast stretches unfolding before him. Through an error in calculation his uncle failed to meet him at the country station where he finally disembarked. He had no word of English with which to ask his way. The prairie spread on every hand; the sun was going down. He walked half the night, without food or water, until at last he found Norwegians who could direct him, reached his uncle's farm, and received a warm welcome.

Then began three years of farming. At the end of that time he knew that he did not like it; this was not the life for him. He had saved a little money, but had picked up only a smattering of English. A friend kept urging him to go to school. But his father's verdict, which so far had ruled his life, still had power over him; he firmly believed that it would be of no use, that he was not worth educating. Instead he went to Sioux City, Iowa, and tried to find work there—factory work, a chance to tend bar in a saloon, a job of washing dishes in a restaurant. But nothing offered; he was forced to return to the farm. He had now reached another crossroads in his life; a flat alternative faced him—farming or schooling. As the lesser of two evils, he entered Augustana College, a grammar or preparatory school in Canton, South Dakota, in the fall of 1899. At that time he was twenty-three years old.

Once at school, the fierce desire for knowledge, so long restrained, took him by storm. In a short while he discovered the cruel wrong that had been done him. His mind was mature and receptive; he was able to learn with amazing ease; in general reading, in grasp of life and strength of purpose, he was far in advance of his fellow students. He graduated from Augustana in the spring of 1901; that fall he entered St. Olaf College, with forty dollars in his pocket. In four years he had worked his way through St. Olaf, graduating with honours in 1905, at the age of twenty-eight. On the promise of a faculty position at his alma mater, he borrowed five hundred dollars and sent himself for a year to the University of Oslo in Norway. Returning from this post-graduate work in 1906, he took up his teaching at St. Olaf College, where he has been ever since. Professor Rölvaag now occupies the chair of Norwegian literature at that institution.

IV

I have mentioned the Amerika-Breve, published in 1912. There is an earlier work, still in manuscript—a novel written during his senior year at St. Olaf College. In all, Rölvaag has published six novels, two readers for class use, a couple of handbooks on Norwegian grammar and declamation, and one volume of essays. In 1914 appeared his second book, Paa Glemte Veie (The Forgotten Path), a relatively unimportant product. Then came the war, which threw consternation into all creative work. Rölvaag walked the hills of southern Minnesota, his mind a blank, facing the downfall of civilization, seeing the death of those fine things of life which he had striven so hard to attain. It was during the war period that he compiled his readers and handbooks, for the publishing board of the Norwegian-American Lutheran Church.

He had married in 1908. In 1920 a tragedy occurred in his family—one of his children was drowned under terrible circumstances. This seems to have shaken him out of the war inertia and stirred his creative life again. That year he wrote and published his first strong novel, To Tullinger (Two Fools), the story of a rough, uncultivated couple, incapable of refinement, who gain success in America and develop the hoarding instinct to a fantastic degree. This book, too, made a sensation among Norwegian-Americans.

Then, in 1922, came Laengselens Baat (The Ship of Longing), which seems to have been Rölvaag's most introspective and poetical effort up to the present time. It is the study of a sensitive, artistic youth who comes to America from Norway full of dreams and ideals, expecting to find all that his soul longs for; he does not find it, with the result that his life goes down in disaster. Needless to say, this book was not popular with his Norwegian-American audience.

The truth-teller of To Tullinger was now going a little too far.

All of these works were written and published in Norwegian. They were brought out under the imprint of the Augsburg Publishing House, of Minneapolis, and circulated only among those Norwegian-Americans who had retained the language of the old country. The reason why none of them had reached publication in Norway is characteristic. In 1912 the manuscript of Amerika-Breve had been submitted to Norwegian publishers. They had returned a favourable and even enthusiastic opinion, but had insisted on certain changes in the text. These changes Rölvaag had refused to concede, feeling that they marred the artistic unity of his work. In anger and disappointment, he had at once published with the local house; and with each successive volume the feeling of artistic umbrage had persisted —it had not seemed worth while to try to reach the larger field.

But in the spring of 1923, an item appeared in the Norwegian press to the effect that the great novelist Johan Bojer was about to visit the United States, for the purpose of collecting material on the Norwegian-American immigration. He proposed to write an epic novel on the movement. This news excited Rölvaag tremendously; he felt that the inner truth of the Norwegian-American immigration could be written only by one who had experienced the transplanting of life, who shared the psychology of the settlers. His artistic ambition was up in arms; this was his own field.

He immediately obtained a year's leave of absence from St. Olaf College, and set to work. The first few sections of Giants In The Earth were written in a cabin in the north woods of Minnesota. Then he felt the need of visiting South Dakota again, to gather fresh material. In midwinter of that year he went abroad, locating temporarily in a cheap immigrant hotel in London, where he worked on the novel steadily. When spring opened in 1924, he went to Norway. There he met Bojer, visiting him at his country home. Bojer was delighted to learn that Rölvaag, of whom he had heard a great deal, was also working on a novel of the Norwegian-American settlement; the two men exchanged ideas generously. "How do you see the problem?" Rölvaag asked. The answer showed him that Bojer saw it from the viewpoint of Norway, not of America; to him it was mainly a problem of emigration. This greatly relieved Rölvaag's mind, for there was no real conflict; he set to work with renewed energy, and soon finished the first book of Giants In The Earth.

In the meanwhile it had been placed with Norwegian publishers—the same firm, by the way, which had lost Amerika-Breve twelve years before. It appeared in the latter part of 1924, under the title I De Dage (In Those Days), a month in advance of Bojer's Vor Egen Stamme (Our Own Tribe), better known to us by its English title of The Emigrants. A year later the second book of the present volume was brought out, under the title Riket Grundlaegges (Founding the Kingdom).

In Norway these two books have run through many editions; they have been hailed on every hand as something new in Norwegian literature. Swedish and Finnish editions will be published in 1927. Arrangements are being made for a German translation, and the book will probably be off the press in Germany soon after it has appeared in the United States. Rölvaag's vigorous, idiomatic style (which, incidentally, has been the despair of those who have worked over the English translation) is an outstanding topic of recent Scandinavian criticism. The eminent Danish critic, Jörgen Bukdahl, for instance, in his latest work, Det Skjulte Norge (The Latent Norway), devotes a whole chapter to Rölvaag and his novels of pioneering in South Dakota. A new name has been added to the literary firmament of Norway.

v

Does Rölvaag's work belong legitimately to Norwegian or to American literature? The problem has unusual and teresting features. The volume before us deals with merican life, and with one of the most characteristically merican episodes in our history. It opens on the western ains; its material is altogether American. Yet it was ritten in Norwegian, and gained its first recognition in orway. Whatever we may decide, it has already become a rt of Norwegian literature. Rölvaag's art seems mainly uropean; Rölvaag himself, as I have said, is typically merican. His life and future are bound up in the New orld; yet he will continue to write in a foreign language. ad he been born in America, would his art have been the me? It seems unlikely. On the other hand, had he mained in Norway—had he accepted the boat that fine, ar day in Nordland—how would his art have fared?

But such speculation, after all, is merely idle; these things not matter. It has not yet been determined, even, what merica is, or whether she herself is strictly American. nd any sincere art is international. Given the artist, our ief interest lies in trying to fathom the sources of his art, d to recognize its sustaining impulses. What were the rces which have now projected into American letters a alist of the first quality writing in a foreign language a w tale of the founding of America? It is obvious that ese forces must have been highly complex and that they ll continue to be so throughout his working life; but yond that we cannot safely go. The rest is a matter of inion. When I have asked Rölvaag the simple question, d Norway or America teach you to write? he has inriably thrown up his hands.

The same speculation, in different measure, applies to a nsiderable quantity of Norwegian-American literary proction which as yet our criticism knows nothing about. e Norwegians are a book-loving people; no set of adverse nditions can for long restrain them from expressing themves in literary form. Here in the Northwest, during the t thirty or forty years, they have built up a distinctive erature, written and published in the Norwegian language, t concerned wholly with American life. Until quite recently, in fact, the region supported a Norwegian fictio magazine.

There are the five substantial novels of Simon Johnson for instance, with many short stories by the same author There are the romantic novels of H. A. Foss; and th poetry, short stories, novels, and travelogues of Pee Strömme. There are the polemical and poetical works o O. A. Buslett, obscure and fantastic. There are the thre novels and four collections of short stories by the abl writer, Waldemar Ager. There is the lyric poetry of Juliu B. Baumann and O. S. Sneve, the collected works of both of whom have now been brought out. There are the amazin Biblical dramas of the farmer-poet Jon Norstog—hug tomes with the titles of Moses, and Israel, and Saul, set u by his own hand and published from his own printing press in a shanty on the prairies of North Dakota—works tha reveal the flash of genius now and then, as I am told. D all these serious efforts belong to Norwegian or to Amer ican literature? Their day is nearly done; the present gen eration of Norse stock has another native language. Bu it would be of value to have some of this early Norwegian American product translated into English, to enrich ou literature by a pure stream flowing out of the America environment—a stream which, for the general public, lie frozen in the ice of a foreign tongue.

LINCOLN COLCORD.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA,
January, 1927.

Book I
THE LAND-TAKING

Toward the Sunset

I

BRIGHT, clear sky over a plain so wide that the rim of the heavens cut down on it around the entire horizon. . . . Bright, clear sky, to-day, to-morrow, and for all me to come.

. . . And sun! And still more sun! It set the heavens re every morning; it grew with the day to quivering golden ght—then softened into all the shades of red and purple evening fell. . . . Pure colour everywhere. A gust of nd, sweeping across the plain, threw into life waves of llow and blue and green. Now and then a dead black wave ould race over the scene . . . a cloud's gliding shadow . . . w and then. . . .

It was late afternoon. A small caravan was pushing its ay through the tall grass. The track that it left behind was ce the wake of a boat—except that instead of widening out tern it closed in again.

"Tish-ah!" said the grass. . . . "Tish-ah, tish-ah!" . . . ever had it said anything else—never would it say anything se. It bent resiliently under the trampling feet; it did not eak, but it complained aloud every time—for nothing like is had ever happened to it before. . . . "Tish-ah, tish-ah!" cried, and rose up in surprise to look at this rough, hard ing that had crushed it to the ground so rudely, and then oved on.

A stocky, broad-shouldered man walked at the head of e caravan. He seemed shorter than he really was, because the tall grass around him and the broad-brimmed hat of arse straw which he wore. A few steps behind him fol-wed a boy of about nine years of age. The boy's blond hair was clearly marked against his brown, sunburnt neck; but the man's hair and neck were of exactly the same shade of brown. From the looks of these two, and still more from their gait, it was easy to guess that here walked father and son.

Behind them a team of oxen jogged along; the oxen were drawing a vehicle which once upon a time might have been a wagon, but which now, on account of its many and grave infirmities, ought long since to have been consigned to the scrap heap—exactly the place, in point of fact, where the man had picked it up. Over the wagon box long willow saplings had been bent, in the form of arches in a church chancel—six of them in all. On these arches, and tied down to the body on each side, were spread first of all two hand-woven blankets, that might well have adorned the walls of some manor house in the olden times; on top of the blankets were thrown two sheepskin robes, with the wool side down, which were used for bed-coverings at night. The rear of the wagon was stowed full of numberless articles, all the way up to the top. A large immigrant chest at the bottom of the pile, very long and high, devoured a big share of the space; around and above it were piled household utensils, tools, implements, and all their clothing.

Hitched to this wagon and trailing behind was another vehicle, homemade and very curious-looking, so solidly and quaintly constructed that it might easily have won a place in any museum. Indeed, it appeared strong enough to stand all the jolting from the Atlantic to the Pacific. . . . It, too, was a wagon, after a fashion; at least, it had been intended for such. The wheels were made from pieces of plank fitting roughly together; the box, considerably wider than that of the first wagon, was also loaded full of provisions and household gear, covered over with canvas and lashed down securely. Both wagons creaked and groaned loudly every time they bounced over a tussock or hove out of a hollow. . . . "Squeak, squeak!" said the one. . . . "Squeak, squeak!" answered the other. . . . The strident sound broke the silence of centuries.

A short distance behind the wagons followed a brindle
w. The caravan moved so slowly that she occasionally had ne to stop and snatch a few mouthfuls, though there was ver a chance for many at a time. But what little she got this way she sorely needed. She had been jogging along day, swinging and switching her tail, the rudder of the avan. Soon it would be night, and then her part of the rk would come—to furnish milk for the evening porridge, r all the company up ahead.

Across the front end of the box of the first wagon lay a igh piece of plank. On the right side of this plank sat woman with a white kerchief over her head, driving the en. Against her thigh rested the blond head of a little l, who was stretched out on the plank and sleeping sweetly.
w and then the hand of the mother moved across the ld's face to chase away the mosquitoes, which had begun gather as the sun lowered. On the left side of the plank, ond the girl, sat a boy about seven years old—a wellwn lad, his skin deeply tanned, a certain clever, watchful am in his eyes. With hands folded over one knee, he ked straight ahead.

This was the caravan of Per Hansa, who with his family l all his earthly possessions was moving west from lmore County, Minnesota, to Dakota Territory. There intended to take up land and build himself a home; he s going to do something remarkable out there, which uld become known far and wide. No lack of opportunity that country, he had been told! . . . Per Hansa himself de ahead and laid out the course; the boy Ole, or mand, followed closely after, and explored it. Beret, wife, drove the oxen and took care of little Anna Marie,
-named And-Ongen (which means "The Duckling"), o was usually bubbling over with happiness. Hans Kris-n, whose everyday name was Store-Hans (meaning "Big ns," to distinguish him from his godfather, who was also med Hans, but who, of course, was three times his size), there on the wagon, and saw to it that everyone attended business. . . . The cow Rosie trailed behind, swinging and switching her tail, following the caravan farther and farther yet into the endless vista of the plain.

"Tish-ah, tish-ah!" cried the grass. . . . "Tish-ah tish-ah!" . . .

II

The caravan seemed a miserably frail and Lilliputian thing as it crept over the boundless prairie toward the sky line. No road or trail there lay not a trace ahead; as soon as the grass had straightened up again behind, no one could have told the direction from which it had come or whither it was bound. The whole train—Per Hansa with his wife and children, the oxen, the wagons, the cow, and all—might just as well have dropped down out of the sky. Nor was it at all impossible to imagine that they were trying to get back there again; their course was always the same—straight toward the west, straight toward the sky line. . . .

Poverty-stricken, unspeakably forlorn, the caravan creaked along, advancing at a snail's pace, deeper and deeper into a bluish-green infinity—on and on, and always farther on. . . . It steered for Sunset Land! . . .

For more than three weeks now, and well into the fourth, this caravan had been crawling across the plain. . . . Early in the journey it had passed through Blue Earth; it had left Chain Lakes behind; and one fine day it had crept into Jackson, on the Des Moines River. But that seemed ages ago. . . . From Jackson, after a short lay-up, it had pushed on westward—always westward—to Worthington, then to Rock River. . . . A little west of Rock River, Per Hansa had lost the trail completely. Since then he had not been able to find it again; at this moment he literally did not know where he was, nor how to get to the place he had to reach. But Split Rock Creek must lie out there somewhere in the sun; if he could only find that landmark, he could pick his way still farther without much trouble. . . . Strange that he hadn't reached Split Rock Creek before this time! According to his directions, he should have been there two or ee days ago; but he hadn't seen anything that even looked e the place. . . . Oh, my God! If something didn't turn soon! . . . My God! . . .

The wagons creaked and groaned. Per Hansa's eyes ndered over the plain. His bearded face swung con-ntly from side to side as he examined every inch of ground m the northeast to the southwest. At times he gave his ole attention to that part of the plain lying between him ll the western sky line; with head bent forward and eyes ed and searching, he would sniff the air, like an animal ing to find the scent. Every now and then he glanced at old silver watch which he carried in his left hand; but gaze would quickly wander off again, to take up its fruits search of the empty horizon.

t was now nearing six o'clock. Since three in the after-on he had been certain of his course; at that time he had en his bearings by means of his watch and the sun. . . .
t here one had to get one's cross-bearings from the very y itself—then trust to luck. . . .

For a long while the little company had been silent. Per nsa turned halfway around, and without slackening his e spoke to the boy walking behind.

"Go back and drive for a while now, Ola.[1] . . . You must to mother, too, so that it won't be so lonesome for her.
d be sure to keep as sharp a lookout as you can."

"I'm not tired yet!" said the boy, loath to leave the van.

"Go back, anyway! Maybe you're not, but I can feel it inning to tell on me. We'll have to start cooking the ridge pretty soon. . . . You go back, and hold her on the for a while longer."

"Do you think we'll catch up with them to-night, Dad?"
e boy was still undecided.

"Good Lord, no! They've got too long a start on us.
. Look sharp, now! If you happen to see anything picious, sing out!" . . . Per Hansa glanced again at his ch, turned forward, and strode steadily onward.

[1] In most dialects of Norway the name Ole becomes Ola when ken.

Ole said no more; he stepped out of the track and stood there waiting till the train came up. Then Store-Hans jumped down nimbly, while the other climbed up and took his seat.

"Have you seen anything?" the mother asked in an anxious voice.

"Why, no . . . not yet," answered the boy, evasively.

"I wonder if we shall ever see them again," she said, as if speaking to herself, and looked down at the ground. "This seems to be taking us to the end of the world . . . beyond the end of the world!"

Store-Hans, who was still walking beside the wagon, heard what she said and looked up at her. The buoyancy of childhood shone in his brown face. . . . Too bad that mother should be so scared! . . .

"Yes, Mother, but when we're both steering for the sun we'll both land in the same place, won't we? . . . The sun is a sure guide, you know!"

These were the very words which he had heard his father use the night before; now he repeated them. To Store-Hans the truth of them seemed as clear as the sun itself; in the first place, because dad had said it, and then because it sounded so reasonable.

He hurried up alongside his father and laid his hand in his—he always felt safer thus.

The two walked on side by side. Now and then the boy stole a glance at the face beside him, which was as stern and fixed as the prairie on which they were walking. He was anxious to talk, but couldn't find anything to say that sounded grown-up enough; and so he kept quiet. At last, however, the silence grew too heavy for him to bear. He tried to say indifferently, just like his father:

"When I'm a man and have horses, I'm going to make a road over these plains, and . . . and put up some posts for people to follow. Don't you think that'll be a good idea?"

A slight chuckle came from the bearded face set toward the sun.

'Sure thing, Store-Hans—you'll manage that all right

. . I might find time to help you an hour or two, now and n."

The boy knew by his father's voice that he was in a talk-ve mood. This made him so glad, that he forgot himself did something that his mother always objected to; he an to whistle, and tried to take just as long strides as his
ner. But he could only make the grass say: "Swish-sh, sh-sh!"

On and on they went, farther out toward Sunset Land—ther into the deep glow of the evening.

The mother had taken little Anna up in her lap and was v leaning backward as much as she could; it gave such ef to her tired muscles. The caresses of the child and lively chatter made her forget for a moment care and iety, and that vague sense of the unknown which bore in them so strongly from all directions. . . . Ole sat there . drove like a full-grown man; by some means or other managed to get more speed out of the oxen than the her had done—she noticed this herself. His eyes were rching the prairie far and near.

Out on the sky line the huge plain now began to swell rise, almost as if an abscess were forming under the skin the earth. Although this elevation lay somewhat out of course, Per Hansa swung over and held straight toward highest part of it.

The afternoon breeze lulled, and finally dropped off alto-
her. The sun, whose golden lustre had faded imperceptibly into a reddish hue, shone now with a dull light, yet strong clear; in a short while, deeper tones of violet began to ep across the red. The great ball grew enormous; it re-ted farther and farther into the empty reaches of the stern sky; then it sank suddenly. . . . The spell of eve-g quickly crowded in and laid hold of them all; the oxen gged their ears; Rosie lifted her voice in a long moo, ch died out slowly in the great stillness. At the moment en the sun closed his eye, the vastness of the plain seemed rise up on every hand—and suddenly the landscape had wn desolate; something bleak and cold had come into the silence, filling it with terror. . . . Behind them, along th way they had come, the plain lay dark green and lifeless under the gathering shadow of the dim, purple sky.

Ole sat motionless at his mother's side. The falling o evening had made such a deep impression on him that hi throat felt dry; he wanted to express some of the emotion that overwhelmed him, but only choked when he tried.

"Did you ever see anything so beautiful!" he whispere at last, and gave a heavy sigh. . . . Low down in the north west, above the little hill, a few fleecy clouds hovered, be tokening fair weather; now they were fringed with shinin gold, which glowed with a mellow light. As if they had n weight, they floated lightly there. . . .

The mother drew herself forward to an upright position She still held the child in her lap. Per Hansa and Store Hans were walking in the dusk far up ahead. For the las two days Per had kept well in advance of the caravan all th time; she thought she knew the reason why.

"Per," she called out, wearily, "aren't we going to sto soon?"

"Pretty soon." . . . He did not slacken his pace.

She shifted the child over into the other arm and bega to weep silently. Ole saw it, but pretended not to notice though he had to swallow big lumps that were forcing them selves up in his throat; he kept his eyes resolutely fixed o the scene ahead.

"Dad," he shouted after a while, "I see a wood over ther to the westward!"

"You do, do you? A great fellow you are! Store Hans and I have seen that for a long time now."

"Whereabouts is it?" whispered Store-Hans, eagerly.

"It begins down there on the slope to the left, and the goes around on the other side," said his father. "Anyway it doesn't seem to be much of a wood."

"D'you think they are there?"

"Not on your life! But we're keeping the right course anyhow."

"Have the others been this way?"

'Of course they have—somewhere near, at any rate. ere's supposed to be a creek around here, by the name of lit Rock Creek, or whatever they call it in English."

"Are there any people here, do you think?"

"People? Good Lord, no! There isn't a soul around se parts."

The sombre blue haze was now closing rapidly in on the ravan. One sensed the night near at hand; it breathed a ll as it came.

At last Per Hansa halted. "Well, I suppose we can't drive farther to-day. We and the animals would both drop tty soon." With these words he faced the oxen, held his ns straight out like the horizontal beam of a cross, shouted ong-drawn "Whoa!"—and then the creaking stopped for t day.

III

The preparations for the night were soon made; each had own task and was now well used to it. Store-Hans ught the wood; it lay strapped under the hind wagon and sisted of small logs and dry branches from the last cket they had passed.

Ole got the fireplace ready. From the last wagon he ught out two iron rods, cleft in one end; these he drove o the ground and then went back to the wagon for a third , which he laid across the other two. It was also his duty see that there was water enough in the keg, no matter ere they happened to stop; for the rest of it, he was on d to help his mother.

The father tended to the cattle. First he lifted the yoke the oxen and turned them loose; then he milked Rosie l let her go also. After that he made up a bed for the ole family under the wagon.

While the mother waited for the pot to boil she set the le. She spread a home-woven blanket on the ground, l a spoon for each one on it, placed a couple of bowls for milk, and fetched the dishes for the porridge. Meanwhile she had to keep an eye on And-Ongen, who wa toddling about in the grass near by. The child stumble laughed, lay there a moment chattering to herself, then g up, only to trip on her skirt and tumble headlong agai Her prattling laughter rang on the evening air. Now an then the voice of the mother would mingle with it, warnin the child not to stray too far.

Store-Hans was the first to get through with his task; h stood around awhile, but, finding nothing more to do, h strolled off westward. He was itching to know how far i was to the hill out there; it would be great fun to see wha things looked like on the other side! . . . Now he starte off in that direction. Perhaps he might come across th others? They surely must be somewhere. Just think, i he could only find them! He would yell and rush in o them like an Indian—and then they would be scared out o their senses! . . . He had gone quite far before he pause to look back. When he did so the sight sent a shiver ove him; the wagons had shrunk to two small specks, away off o the floor of a huge, dusky room. . . . I'd better hurry a once, he thought; mother will surely have the porridg ready by this time! His legs had already adopted the ide of their own accord. But thoughts of his mother and th porridge didn't quite bring him all the feeling of safety h needed; he hunted through his mind for a few strains of hymn, and sang them over and over in a high-pitched, break ing voice, until he had no more breath left to sing with. . . He didn't feel entirely safe until the wagons had begun t assume their natural size once more.

The mother called to them that supper was ready. On th blanket stood two dishes of porridge—a large dish for th father and the two boys, a smaller one for the mother an And-Ongen. The evening milk was divided between tw bowls, and set before them; Rosie, poor thing, was no giving much these days! The father said that he didn' care for milk this evening, either; it had a tangy taste, h thought; and he drank water with his porridge. But whe Ole also began to complain of the tangy taste and asked fo

er, the father grew stern and ordered him to go ahead get that drop of milk down as quick as he could! There nothing else on the table but milk and porridge.
uddenly Ole and Store-Hans flared up in a quarrel; one ned the other for eating too close to the edge, where the idge was coolest. The father paused in his meal, listen-to them a moment, then chuckled to himself. Taking his on and cutting three lines through the crust of the pore, he quickly settled the matter between them.
There you are! Here, Store-Hans, is your land; now it and be satisfied. Ola, who is the biggest, gets another
y. . . . Shut up your mouths, now, and eat!" Per sa himself got the smallest share that evening.
side from this outbreak it was quiet at the table. A spell ilence lay upon them and they were not able to throw ff. . . . As soon as the father had eaten he licked his on carefully, wiped it off on his shirt sleeve, and threw it he blanket. The boys did likewise as they finished; but l-Ongen wanted to tuck her spoon in her dress and keep ere till morning.
hey sat around in the same silence after they were done.
n she who was the smallest of them repeated in a tiny e:
Thanks to Thee, Our Lord and Maker. . . .
Now I want to go to sleep in your lap!" she said, after Amen. She climbed up into her mother's lap and threw arms around her neck.
Oh, how quickly it grows dark out here!" the mother mured.
er Hansa gave a care-free shrug of his shoulders.
ell," he said, dryly, "the sooner the day's over, the sooner next day comes!"
ut now something seemed to be brewing back there over prairie whence they had come. Up from the horizon led a supernatural light—a glow of pale yellow and sparent green, mingled with strange touches of red and
. It spread upward as they watched; the colors deepened; the glow grew stronger, like the witching light of fen fire.

All sat silently gazing. It was And-Ongen, hangin around her mother's neck, who first found her voice.

"Oh, look! . . . She is coming up again!"

In solemn grandeur the moon swung up above the plai She had been with them many nights now; but each tim she seemed as wonderful a sight as ever. To-night a hus fell on their spirits as they watched her rise—just as th scene had hushed them the evening before, far away to th eastward somewhere on the plain. The silvery beams gre stronger; the first pale fen fire began to shimmer and spread slowly the light mellowed into a mist of green and yello and blue. And-Ongen exclaimed that the moon was muc bigger to-night; but it had seemed bigger the night befor also. Store-Hans again solemnly told her the reason for —that the moon had to grow, just as she did! This seeme to her quite logical; she turned to her mother and aske whether the moon had milk and porridge every evening, too

Per Hansa had been sitting on the tongue of the wagon smoking his pipe. Now he got up, knocked out the ashe carefully, put his pipe in his pocket, and wound up his watch These duties done, he gave the order to turn in for the nigh

A little while later they all lay under the quilts, gazin off into the opalescent glow. When the mother thought tha the children had gone to sleep she asked, soberly:

"Do you suppose we'll ever find the others again?"

"Oh yes—I'm sure of it . . . if they haven't sunk throug the ground!"

This was all Per Hansa said. He yawned once or twice long and heavily, as if he were very sleepy, and turned awa from her.

. . . After that she said no more, either.

IV

Truth to tell, Per Hansa was not a bit sleepy. For long while he lay wide awake, staring into the night. A ugh the evening had grown cool, sweat started out on his y from time to time, as thoughts which he could not ish persisted in his mind.

He had good reason to sweat, at all the things he was ced to lie there and remember. Nor was it only to-night these heavy thoughts came to trouble him; it had been the same all through the day, and last night, too, and night before. And now, the moment he had lain down, had seized upon him with renewed strength; he recalled nly all the scruples and misgivings that had obsessed his e before they had started out on this long journey—both se which had been spoken and those which had been left aid. The latter had been the worst; they had seemed to w deeper and more tragic as he had kept prying into them his clumsy way. . . . But she wasn't a bit stupid, that e of his! As a matter of fact, she had more sense than st people. Indeed she had!

. . No, it wasn't a pleasant situation for Per Hansa, by means. He had not seen a happy moment, day or night, e the mishap had struck them on the second afternoon side of Jackson. There the first wagon had got stuck mud hole; in pulling it out they had wrecked it so hope-ly that he had been forced to put back to Jackson for airs. Under the circumstances, it had seemed to him erly senseless to hold up all the rest of the company four
s. He simply wouldn't listen to their waiting for him; they had houses to build and fields to break, if they were get anything into the ground this season. They must go without him; he'd come along all right, in his own good
e. . . . So they had given him full instructions about course he was to follow and the halting places where was to stop for the night; it had all seemed so simple him at the time. Then they had started on together—nseten, who knew the way, and Hans Olsa, and the two um boys. They all had horses and strong new wagons.
ey travelled fast, those fellows! . . .

f he only had paid some attention to Hans Olsa, who for ng while had insisted on waiting for him. But he had overruled all their objections; it was entirely his own doin that Hans Olsa and the others had gone on, leaving hi behind.

But he soon had learned that it wasn't so easy. Hadr he lost his way altogether the other day, in the midst of fog and drizzling rain? Until late in the afternoon that da he hadn't had the faintest idea what direction he was takin It had been after this experience that he had formed th habit of keeping so far ahead of the caravan. He simp couldn't endure listening to her constant questions—questio which he found himself unable to answer. . . .

The only thing he felt sure of was that he wasn't on th right track; otherwise he would have come across the trac of their camps. It was getting to be a matter of life ar death to him to find the trail—and find it soon. . . . A dev of a jaunt it would be to the Pacific Ocean—the wagon wou never hold out that long! . . . Oh yes, he realized it all to well—a matter of life and death. There weren't many su plies left in the wagon. He had depended on his old con rade and Lofot-man,[1] Hans Olsa, for everything.

Per Hansa heaved a deep sigh; it came out before he cou stop it. . . . Huh!—it was an easy matter enough for Ha Olsa! He had ample means, and could start out on a b scale from the beginning; he had a wife in whose heart the wasn't a speck of fear! . . . The Lord only knew whe they were now—whether they were east or west of hin And they had Tönseten, too, and his wife Kjersti,[2] both o them used to America. Why, they could talk the languag and everything. . . .

And then there were the Solum boys, who had actuall been born in this country. . . . Indeed, east or west, it mad no difference to them where they lay that night.

But here was he, the newcomer, who owned nothing an knew nothing, groping about with his dear ones in the end less wilderness! . . . Beret had taken such a dislike to th

[1] A companion on the winter fishing grounds at the Lofoten Island
[2] The combination kj in this name is pronounced like ch in church the final i has the sound of y in godly.

rney, too—although in many ways she was the more sible of the two. . . . Well, he certainly had fixed up ice mess for himself, and no mistake!

He wondered why he had ever left Fillmore County; as he there thinking it over, he couldn't understand what had mpted him to do such a thing. He could easily have nd a job there and stayed until his wife got up from dbed; then he could have moved west next spring. This been what she had wanted, though she had never said n so many words.

The quilt had grown oppressively heavy; he threw it aside. . How long it took her to go to sleep to-night! Why uldn't she try to get as much rest as possible? Surely knew that it would be another tough day to-mor-w? . . .

. . Just so that confounded wagon didn't go to pieces in! . . .

V

The night wore on. The children slept quietly and peace-ly. The mother also seemed to have found rest at last. Hansa thought that she was sound asleep; he began to ve slowly away from her. He threw his hand over on the lt between them as if making a motion in his sleep. . . . , she didn't stir; he lay quiet for a while, then moved in. In so doing his hand happened to fall on that of re-Hans; it was so chubby and round, that hand, so lthy and warm, and quite firm for the hand of only a d. Per Hansa lay still for a long time, holding the boy's d with a desperate earnestness. . . . Slowly the trouble-ne thoughts seemed to lighten and lift; his courage ebbed k again; surely everything would come out all right in end!

Little by little he slipped the quilt off, crept out of bed quietly as a mouse, got into his trousers, and pulled on shoes.

Outside, the misty sheen of the moonlight shimmered so brightly that it blinded him. Near at hand, the prairie wa bathed in a flood of tarnished green; farther off the fair blue tones began to appear, merging gradually into the purpl dimness that shrouded all the horizon.

Per Hansa looked for the North Star, found it, turne about until he had it over his right shoulder; then he glance at his watch, took a few steps, hesitated, and looked back a if taking a bearing of the wagons and the star. The nex moment he faced about resolutely, and hurried off westward

It felt good to be moving again; he almost broke into trot. There were the oxen, busily grazing; they needed t get their fill all right, poor devils! . . . Rosie lay close to the wagons; his eyes had passed over her at first, a darl spot in the vague, deceptive light. The cow must hav noticed the shadow gliding along so swiftly; she gave a lon moo. . . . This enraged Per Hansa; he broke into a ru and got out of her sight as quickly as he could, for fear sh would moo again. . . . If she only hadn't waked Beret!

He set his course toward the point where he thought th crest of the ridge must lie. Now and then he stopped an looked around, to find out if he could still see the wagons When he had lost them at last, and they were wholly swal lowed up in the night, he gave an involuntary gasp—bu clenched his teeth and went on.

The ridge lay farther off than he had thought. He ha walked for a solid hour before he finally reached what h felt to be the highest point; he reckoned that he must b at least four miles from camp. . . . There he fell to exam ining the ground carefully; but first of all he looked at hi watch again, and then at the North Star and the moon, try ing to fix the bearings of the camp in his mind.

On the other side of the ridge the lay of the land seemed to be different; the slope was a little steeper; a thick under brush covered it; through the tall bushes the moonlight shimmered strangely. . . . Per Hansa felt no fear, but every sense within him was alert. First he searched the northerly slope of the hill, beyond the edge of the thicket, stooping over as he went, his eyes scanning every foot of the ground.

nen he had found no trace of what he was looking for, he ne back to the same starting point and searched an equal tance in the opposite direction; but he discovered nothing this tack, either.

Now he began to walk along the edge of the thicket, in and , crisscrossing the line in every direction; he pushed his y into each little grassless opening, and kicked over the th there, before he went on. Sweat was running off him streams. A quarter of an hour went by; he was still rching frantically. . . . All at once, right at the edge of woods, he struck a piece of level ground with a larger aring on it; in the middle of this clearing lay a wide, nd patch in the grass. Per Hansa threw himself down his knees, like a miser who has found a costly treasure; bent over and sniffed the ground. His blood throbbed; hands shook as he dug. . . . Yes, he was right—here re had been a fire! It couldn't have been many days ago, ner; the smell of the ashes was still fresh. . . . His eyes l grown so moist and dim that he had to wipe them. . . . t he wasn't crying—no, not yet! . . .

He began to crawl around on all fours, farther and farther vn the slope. Suddenly he stopped, sat up on his nches, and held something in his hand that he was exam- ng closely. . . .

"I'll be damned if it isn't fresh horse dung!" . . . His ce rang with a great joy. He tried the stuff between his gers—crumbled it, sniffed at it . . . there was no doubt- the fact any longer.

Now he got up, walking erectly with a confident step, like an who has just made a lucky strike, and began to search ng the whole slope. . . . He might as well go ahead and d the ford to-night; then he wouldn't be delayed by hunt- for it in the morning. The underbrush thickened as he de his way down the slope. . . . Here, then, was Split ck Creek; and here they had camped, as Tönseten had d they would! . . .

Once he had reached the edge of the creek, it did not take n long to find the ford that the others had used; the ruts still stood there plainly, as fresh and deep as if they ha been made that very day. For a while he paused at th edge of the water, and looked about him. . . . Had the chosen the best crossing, after all? The bank of the cree on the other side formed a bend; the brink looked prett steep. At last he waded out into the water, with his shoe still on. . . . Oh, well, the grade wasn't so steep that th oxen couldn't easily make it; there would be a bad jolt her at the edge, but after that they would have an even slope u the bank. . . . Stepping out on the opposite shore, he stoo as if rooted to the ground.

. . . "What in the devil . . . !"

Per Hansa bent over and picked up the object that la before him; he held it out in the moonlight, turned it ove and over in his hands, smelled of it . . . then took a bit

. . . "By God! if it isn't one of Hans Olsa's dried mutto legs!"

He straightened himself up and gazed with deep thank fulness into the quivering bluish-green haze that glowed a around him. . . . "Yes, that's the way it goes, when peopl have more than they can take care of!" . . . He stuck th mutton leg under his arm; whistling a love ballad of Nord land, which seemed to have come into his mind unconsciously he crossed the creek again.

On the way back he took his own time. Nothing mattere now; the night was fair and mild; his aching weariness wa gone; he felt refreshed and strengthened. His wife an children were sleeping safe and sound; of food they stil had supplies for a couple of weeks; and now he had foun the trail again and could be certain of it all the way to Sioux Falls. . . . That wretched wagon was the only difficulty it would have to hang together for a few days more! . .

When he drew near enough to the wagons to make then out clearly in the moonlight, he slackened his pace, and shiver passed over him.

Wasn't some one sitting there on the wagon tongue Surely that was a human form?

In growing apprehension, he hurried on.

"Good Heavens, Beret! What are you doing out here the middle of the night?" His voice was full of alarm, softened by his great concern for her.
"It felt so awful to lie there alone, after you had gone.
I could hardly breathe . . . so I got up."
The words came with difficulty; he realized that her voice hoarse with weeping; he had to pull himself sharply toner in order to keep his own tears back.
"Were you awake, Beret? . . . You shouldn't lie awake way in the night!" he said, reproachfully.
"How can I sleep? . . . You lie there tossing back and th, and say nothing! . . . You might have told me. I w very well what's the matter!"
Suddenly she could stand it no longer. She ran over to n, flung her arms around his neck, and leaned close against
n. The dam of her pent-up tears broke in a flood of otion; she wept long and bitterly.
"Now calm yourself, dear. . . . You must calm yourself, et-girl!" . . . He had put his arm lovingly around her, found it hard to speak. . . . "Don't you see that I've one of Hans Olsa's dried mutton legs under my n?" . . .
. . That night Per Hansa was good to his wife.

II. Home-founding

I

ON THE side of a hill, which sloped gently awa toward the southeast and followed with many wind ings a creek that wormed its way across the prairie stood Hans Olsa, laying turf. He was building a sod house The walls had now risen breast-high; in its half-finishe condition, the structure resembled more a bulwark agains some enemy than anything intended to be a human habita tion. And the great heaps of cut sod, piled up in eac corner, might well have been the stores of ammunition fo defence of the stronghold.

For a man of his strength and massive build, his motion were unusually quick and agile; but he worked by fits an starts to-day. At times he stopped altogether; in thes pauses he would straighten himself up and draw his sleev with a quick stroke across his troubled face; with eac stroke the sleeve would come away damper; and standing so, he would fix his gaze intently on the prairie to the east ward. His eyes had wandered so often now over the stretc of land lying before them, that they were familiar with every tussock and hollow. . . . No—nothing in sight yet! . . He would resume his task, as if to make up for lost time and work hard for a spell; only to forget himself once more pause involuntarily, and stand inert and abstracted, gazing off into the distance.

Beyond the house a tent had been pitched; a wagon was drawn up close beside it. On the ground outside of the ten stood a stove, a couple of chairs, and a few other rough icles of furniture. A stout, healthy-looking woman, ose face radiated an air of simple wisdom and kindliness, s busy preparing the midday meal. She sang to herself she worked. A ten-year-old girl, addressed by the woman Sofie, was helping her. Now and then the girl would e up the tune and join in the singing.

Less than a quarter of a mile away, in a southeasterly ection, a finished sod house rose on the slope of the hill. oke was winding up from it at this moment. This house, ich had been built the previous fall, belonged to Syvert nseten.

Some distance north from the place where Hans Olsa l located, two other sod houses were under construction; a hillock lay between, so that he could not see them from ere he stood. There the two Solum boys had driven wn their stakes and had begun building. Tönseten's com- ted house, and the other three half-finished ones, marked beginning of the settlement on Spring Creek.

The woman who had been bustling about preparing the al, now called to her husband that dinner was ready—he st come at once! He answered her, straightened up for hundredth time, wiped his hands on his trousers, and od for a moment gazing off eastward. . . . No use to k—not a soul in sight yet! . . . He sighed heavily, and lked with slow steps toward the tent, his eyes on the und.

It was light and airy inside the tent, but stifling hot, be- se of the unobstructed sunlight beating down upon it. o beds were ranged along the wall, both of them home- de; a big emigrant chest stood at the head of each. Nails l been driven into the centre pole of the tent, on which ng clothing; higher up a crosspiece, securely fastened, s likewise hung with clothes. Two of the walls were ed with furniture; on these pieces the dishes were dis- yed, all neatly arranged.

A large basin of water stood on a chair just inside the tent or. Hans Olsa washed his face and hands; then he came out and sat down on the ground, where his wife had sprea the table. It was so much cooler outside. The meal was al ready; both mother and daughter had been waiting for him

"I suppose you haven't seen any signs of them yet?" hi wife asked at last.

"No—nothing at all!"

"Can you imagine what has become of them?"

"The Lord forgive us—if I only knew!"

Her husband looked so anxious that she asked no mor questions. Out of her kind heart rose a hopeful, "Don' worry, they'll get here all right!" . . . But in spite of th cheerfulness of the words, she could not give them that rin of buoyant confidence which she would have liked to show

. . . "Of course!" said the girl with a laugh. "Store Hans and Ola have two good pairs of eyes. Leave it t them—they'll find us!"

The father gave her a stern glance; he didn't tell her i words to stop her foolish chatter—but she said no more Without speaking once, he ate his dinner. As soon as he ha finished, he tossed his spoon on the blanket, thanked then for the food, got up gloomily, and went back to the half completed wall. There he sat down awhile, as if lost i thought . . . gazing eastward. His large, rugged feature were drawn and furrowed with anxiety. . . . "God Al mighty!" he sighed, and folded his big hands. "What ca have become of Per Hansa?"

His wife was watching him closely as he sat there on th wall. By and by she told her daughter to finish washin the dishes, and started to go over where he was. Whe he saw her coming, he tried to begin working as if there were nothing on his mind.

"Hans," she said, quickly, when she had reached his side "I think you ought to go out and look for them!"

He waited until he had got a strip of sod in place before he answered: "Easier said than done . . . when we haven' the faintest idea where to look . . . on such stretches o prairie!"

"Yes, I know; but it would make us all feel better, any-y . . . as if we were doing something."
Hans Olsa laid another strip of turf; then he stopped, let s hands fall to his sides, and began thinking aloud as he zed off into the distance. . . .
"I know this much—you don't often find a smarter fellow an Per Hansa. . . . That's what makes it so queer! I n't suppose he's able to get much speed out of his oxen;
t one thing I'm certain of—he has been hurrying as fast
he could. And we surely didn't come along very fast
. but now it's the fifth day since we arrived here! If made use of these bright moonlight nights, as he probably l, I begin to be afraid that he's gone on west of us some-ere, instead of being still to the eastward. . . . It's cernly no child's play to start looking for him!"
Hans Olsa slumped down on the wall, the picture of de-tion. His wife quickly found a place beside him. To-ther they sat there in silence. The same fear that she t him struggling with, a fear thrown into sharp relief the things he had just been saying, had long since gripped r heart also.
"I feel so sorry for Beret, poor thing . . . and the chilen. You must remember, though, that he couldn't go very st on account of her condition. . . . I think she is with ld again!" She paused. "I dreamed about them last ght . . . a bad dream. . . ."
Her husband glanced sidewise at her. "We mustn't pay ention to such things. A bad dream is a good sign, any-y—that's what my mother always said. . . . But I supse I'll never forgive myself for not waiting for him."
e got up heavily and laid another strip of turf. "He's ways been like that, Per Hansa; he never would take help om any man. But this time he's carried it a little too far!"
His wife made no answer. She was watching a short ut man with a reddish beard who had started up the slope om the direction of the house to the south of them. He d cheeks like two rosy apples, a quick step, and eyes that flitted all about; he was noted among them for his glib tongue and the flood of his conversation. With hands stuck into the waistband of his trousers, and elbows out akimbo, the man looked half as broad again as he really was.

"Here comes Tönseten," said the woman. "Why don't you talk it over with him? I really think you ought to go out and look for them."

"Seen anything of them yet, Hans Olsa?" asked the man, without further greeting, as soon as he arrived. . . . "Well, well! this looks fine! Ha, ha! It's a warm house, you know, that's built by the aid of a woman's hand."

Hans Olsa wheeled on him. "You haven't caught sight of them yourself, Syvert, have you?"

"Caught sight of them? Why, man alive, that's just what I've come up here to tell you! I've had them in sight for over an hour now. Seems to me you ought to be able to see them easy enough—you who carry your eyes so high up in the air! . . . Good Lord! it won't be long before they arrive here, at the rate they're coming!"

"What's that you say?" the others burst out with one voice. . . . "Where are they?" . . .

"I reckon Per Hansa must have got off his course a little. Maybe the oxen didn't steer well, or maybe he didn't figure the current right. . . . Look to the westward, neighbours! Look over there about west-northwest, and you'll see him plain enough. . . . No need to worry. That fellow never would drown in such shallow water as this! . . . I wonder, now, how far west he's really been?"

Hans Olsa and his wife faced around in the direction that Tönseten had indicated. Sure enough, out of the west a little caravan was crawling up toward them on the prairie.

"Can that be them? . . . I really believe it is!" said Hans Olsa in a half whisper, as if hardly daring yet to give vent to his joy.

"Of course it is!" cried his wife, excitedly. . . . "Thank God!"

"Not the least doubt of it," Tönseten assured them. "You might as well go and put your coffeepot on the stove, Mother örrina![1] That Kjersti of mine is coming over pretty soon; e'll probably have something good tucked under her apron. . In half an hour we'll have the lost sheep back in the ld!"

"Yes! Heavens and earth, Sörrina!" cried Hans Olsa, etch out the best you've got! . . . Per, Per, is it really u, old boy? . . . But why are you coming from the west, d like to know?"

Tönseten coughed, and gave the woman a sly wink.

"Look here, Mother Sörrina," he said with a twinkle in his es, "won't you be good enough, please, to take a peek at ans Olsa's Sunday bottle? . . . Not that I want anything drink, you understand—I should say not. Good Lord, ! But think of that poor woman out there, who has been ffering all this time without a drop! And I'd be willing bet that Per Hansa wouldn't object to having his stomach armed up a little, too!"

At that they burst out laughing, from mingled joy and lief; but Tönseten's laughter at his own joke was the udest of all. . . . Work was resumed at once; Syvert gan to carry the sods for Hans Olsa to lay up, while other Sörrina went off in a happy frame of mind, to make er preparations for the reception of the wanderers.

Before the half hour allotted by Tönseten had passed, the travan came slowly crawling up the slope. Per Hansa ill strode in the van, with Store-Hans at his side; Ole alked abreast of the oxen, driving them with the goad. eret and And-Ongen sat in the wagon. Rosie came jog- ng along behind at her own gait; she gave a loud, pro- nged "moo-o-o-o" as she discovered the other animals ross the prairie.

Both families stood ready to receive them; Hans Olsa and örine, Tönseten and his Kjersti, all watching intently the ovements of the approaching company; but the girl couldn't possess her patience any longer, and ran down to meet the new arrivals. She took Store-Hans by the hand and fell in beside him; the first question she asked was whether he hadn't been terribly scared at night? . . .

[1] The name properly is Sörine, with the accent on the second llable; but in the dialect of Helgeland it is pronounced Sörrina, ith the accent on the first. These people all came from the district f Helgeland, in Norway.

As the slope of the hill grew steeper, the oxen had to bend to the yoke.

"Hey, there, folks!" shouted Per Hansa, boisterously. "Don't be standing around loafing, now! It's only the middle of the afternoon. Haven't you got anything to do around here?"

"Coffee time, coffee time, Per Hansa . . . ha, ha, ha!" Tönseten was bubbling over with good spirits. "We thought we might as well wait a little while for you, you know."

. . . "You've found us at last!" said Hans Olsa, with a deep, happy chuckle. . . . He didn't seem able to let go of Per Hansa's hand.

"Found you? Why, devil take it, it's no trick to follow a course out here! You just have to keep on steering straight ahead. And you had marked the trail pretty well, all the way along. I found plenty of traces of you. . . . I guess we stood a little too far to the westward, between Sioux Falls and here; that's how it happened. . . . So this is the place, is it? . . . The pastures of Goshen in the land of Egypt—eh?"

"Just so, just so!" cried Tönseten, nodding and laughing. "Pastures of Goshen—right you are! That's exactly what we are going to call the place—Goshen—if only you haven't sailed in to mix things up for us!" . . .

Beret and the child had now got down from the wagon; the other two women hovered around her, drawing her toward the tent. But she hung back for a moment; she wanted to stop and look around.

. . . Was this the place? . . . Here! . . . Could it be possible? . . . She stole a glance at the others, at the half-completed hut, then turned to look more closely at the group standing around her; and suddenly it struck her that here something was about to go wrong. . . . For several days she had sensed this same feeling; she could not seem to tear rself loose from the grip of it. . . . A great lump kept ming up in her throat; she swallowed hard to keep it back, ll forced herself to look calm. Surely, surely, she mustn't re way to her tears now, in the midst of all this joy. . . . Then she followed the other two women into the tent; eing a chair, she sank down in it, as if her strength had ne!

Sörine was patting her on the shoulder. . . . "Come, get ur things off, Beret. You ought to loosen up your clothes, u know. Just throw this dress of mine around you. . . . ere's the water to wash yourself in. Let down your hair, d take your time about it. . . . Don't mind Kjersti and e being around."

After they had bustled about for a little while the others t her. The moment they had gone she jumped up and ssed the tent, to look out of the door. . . . How will man beings be able to endure this place? she thought. hy, there isn't even a thing that one can hide behind! . Her sensitive, rather beautiful face was full of blank may; she turned away from the door and began to loosen dress; then her eyes fell on the centre pole with its cross-ece, hung with clothes, and she stood a moment irresolute, zing at it in startled fright. . . . It looked like the giants e had read about as a child; for a long while she was un-le to banish the picture from her mind.

Outside the tent, Ole stood with his hand resting on one the oxen. He was disgusted; the older people seemed to ve clean forgotten his existence. They never would get ne talking—when he, too, might have had a word to put ! . . .

"Hadn't we better unhitch the oxen, Dad?"

"Yes, yes—that's right, Ola. We might as well camp wn here for the night, since we've run across some folks used to know. . . . How about it, you fellows?" He rned to the other two. "I suppose there's a little more nd left around here, isn't there, after you've got through?"

"Land? Good God! Per Hansa, what are you talking out? Take whatever you please, from here to the Pacific Ocean!" Tönseten's enthusiasm got so far away with him that he had to pull one of his hands out of his waistband and make a sweeping circle with it in the air.

"You must take a look around as soon as you can," Hans Olsa said, "and see if you find anything better that meets your fancy. In the meanwhile I've put down a stake for you on the quarter section that lies north of mine. We'll go over and have a look at it pretty soon. Sam Solum wanted it, but I told him he'd better leave it till you came. . . . You see, you would be next to the creek there; and then you and I would be the nearest neighbours, just as we've always planned. It makes no particular difference to Sam; he can take the quarter alongside his brother's."

Per Hansa drew a deep breath, as if filling himself with life's great goodness. . . . Here Hans Olsa had been worrying about him, and with kindly forethought had arranged everything to his advantage! . . . "Well, well, we'll have to settle all that later, Hans Olsa. For the present, I can only say that I'm deeply thankful to you! . . . Unhitch the beasts, there, Ola! . . . And now, if you folks have got anything handy, to either eat or drink, I'll accept it with pleasure."

. . . "Or both, Per Hansa!" put in Tönseten, excitedly. "Yes, both, Syvert. I won't refuse!"

Soon they were all gathered around a white cloth which Mother Sörine had spread on the ground. On one side of it lay a whole leg of dried mutton; on the other a large heap of flatbröd, with cheese, bread, and butter; in the centre of the cloth stood a large bowl of sweet milk, and from the direction of the stove the breeze wafted to them a pleasant odour of fried bacon and strong coffee. Mother Sörine herself took charge of the ceremony, bringing the food and urging them all to sit down. The stocky figure of Per Hansa rocked back and forth in blissful delight as he squatted there with his legs crossed under him.

"Come, Sörrina, sit down!" he cried. "I guess we've fallen in with gentlefolks, by the looks of things around here.

. I suppose you think you're old Pharaoh himself—eh, ans Olsa?"

"Who do you call me, then?" inquired Tönseten.

"You, Syvert? Well, now, I really don't know what to . Of course you'd like to be His Majesty's butler, t you mustn't be encouraged—remember what happened to at poor fellow! . . . I think we'd better make you the ker—it might be safer, all around. What's your idea, ans Olsa?"

By this time they were all laughing together.

In the midst of the jollification came Sörine, carrying a ite with a large bottle and a dram glass[1] on it. . . . "Here, ke this off my hands, Hans Olsa—you will know what to do th it!"

Tönseten fairly bubbled over in his admiration for her: "Oh, you sweet Sörrina-girl!—you're dearer to my heart an a hundred women! . . . What a blessing it must be, to ve a wife like that!"

"Stop your foolishness!" said Kjersti, but her voice didn't und too severe.

For a long while they continued to sit around the cloth, atting, eating, and drinking, and thoroughly enjoying them- ves. Hans Olsa seemed like a different man from the e who had eaten here at noon. His loud voice led the eerful talk; his ponderous bulk was always the centre of e merriment; it seemed as if he would never tire of gazing to that bearded, roguish face of Per Hansa's.

Once, as Per Hansa was slicing off a piece of mutton, he garded the cut thoughtfully, and asked:

"I suppose you brought all your supplies through safe ough?"

"Oh, sure," answered Hans Olsa, innocently. "We had trouble at all—didn't lose anything; that is, except for e leg that we left behind somewhere, east on the prairie. ut that's hardly worth mentioning."

[1] This bottle and glass would have been old family pieces from orway, the bottle shaped something like an hourglass, with a con- ction in the middle to be grasped by the hand.

Per Hansa paused with the piece of meat halfway to his mouth, and looked at Sörine with an expression of deep concern:

"The devil you say! Did you lose one of your legs . . .?"

Mother Sörine laughed heartily at him. "Oh no—not quite so bad as that. . . . But a leg of mutton might come in handy later on, I'll tell you; there aren't too many of them to be had around here."

Per Hansa chewed away on the meat and looked very serious. At last he said:

"That's always the way with folks who have more of the world's goods than they can take care. . . . But I'll promise you one thing, Sörrina: if I can get my old blunderbuss to work, you're going to have your lost leg back again. . . . How about it, fellows? Have you seen any game that's fit to eat out here?"

III

They sat on until the first blue haze of evening began to spread eastward over the plain. The talk had now drifted to questions of a more serious nature, mostly concerned with how they should manage things out here; of their immediate prospects; of what the future might hold in store for them; of land and crops, and of the new kingdom which they were about to found. . . . No one put the thought into words, but they all felt it strongly; now they had gone back to the very beginning of things. . . .

As the evening shadows deepened the conversation gradually died away into silence. A peculiar mood came drifting in with the dusk. It seemed to float on the evening breeze, to issue forth out of the heart of the untamed nature round about them; it lurked in the very vastness and endlessness surrounding them on every hand; it even seemed to rise like an impalpable mist out of the ground on which they sat.

This mood brought vague premonitions to them, difficult interpret. . . . No telling what might happen out here . . for almost anything could happen! . . .

They were so far from the world . . . cut off from the ıunts of their fellow beings . . . so terribly far! . . .

The faces that gazed into one another were sober now, silence claimed the little company; but lines of strength ıd determination on nearly every countenance told of an ward resolve to keep the mood of depression from gaining ıll control.

Per Hansa was the first to rouse himself and throw off the ell. He jumped up with nervous energy; a shiver passed er him, as if he were having a chill.

"What is it—are you cold?" asked his wife. She had stinctively sensed his mood as she looked at him—and ved him better for it. Until that moment, she had supsed that she herself was the only one who felt this peculiar fluence.

"Such crazy talk!" he burst out. "I believe we've all st our senses, every last one of us! Here we sit around lebrating in broad daylight, in the middle of summer, as it was the Christmas holidays! . . . Come on, woman, t's go over to our new home!"

Everyone got up.

"You must do exactly as you please about it, Per Hansa," oke up Hans Olsa with an apologetic air. "Don't feel that ou must take this quarter if you don't like it. But as far ; I can see, it's as good a piece of land as you could find ıywhere around—every square foot of it plowland, except ıe hill over there. Plenty of water for both man and east. . . . As for my part, if I can only sit here between ou and Syvert, I certainly won't be kicking about my eighbours. . . . But I don't want you to feel that you have take this quarter on my account, you understand. . . . you do take it, though, we must get one of the Solum ys to go down to Sioux Falls with you the first thing -morrow, so that you can file your claim. You'll have to that in any case, you know, whichever quarter you take. . . . There's likely to be a lot of people moving into this region before the snow flies; we five oughtn't to part company or let anyone get in between us. . . . You've heard my best advice, anyway."

"Now, that's the talk!" Tönseten chimed in, briskly. "And considering the size of the head it comes from, it isn't half bad, either. You're damned well right, Hans Olsa. Before the snow flies you're going to see such a multitude swarming around these parts, that the thundering place won't be fit to live in! Remember what I say, boys, in times to come—bear it in mind that those were Syvert's very words! . . . You've got to go straight to Sioux Falls tomorrow morning, Per Hansa, and no two ways about it! If one of the Solum boys can't go along to do the talking for you, why, I shall have to buckle down to the job myself."

Once more Per Hansa's heart filled with a deep sense of peace and contentment as he realized how matters were being smoothed out for him. They seemed to move of their own accord, but he knew better. . . . Was he really to own it? Was it really to become his possession, this big stretch of fine land that spread here before him? Was he really to have his friends for neighbours, both to the north and to the south—folks who cared for him and wanted to help him out in every way? . . .

He was still chuckling with the rare pleasure of it as he asked, "You haven't discovered any signs of life since you came?"

"Devil, no!" Tönseten assured him. "Neither Israelites nor Canaanites! I was the first one to find this place, you know. . . . But there's no telling how soon the drift will loosen, the way folks were talking back East last winter. And now the land office for this whole section of country has been moved to Sioux Falls, too. That means business; the government, you may be certain, has good reason for doing such a thing." Tönseten spoke with all the importance of a man who has inside knowledge.

Per Hansa looked at him, and a bantering tone came into his voice:

"I see it clearly, Syvert—it would never do to keep you ound here as a mere baker! We'll have to promote you a higher office, right away. . . . Now, boys, I'm going er to see this empire that you two have set aside for me. a, you hitch up the oxen again and bring the wagons ng."

With these commands he walked rapidly away; the others d almost to run in order to keep up with him. Strong otions surged through him as he strode on. . . .

"It lies high," he observed after a while, when they had oked all the plowland over. . . . "There must be a fine w from the top of that hill."

They were bending their steps in this direction, and soon d reached the highest point. It seemed so spacious and autiful to stand high above the prairie and look around, pecially now, when the shades of evening were falling. . Suddenly Per Hansa began to step more cautiously; sniffed the air like an animal; in a moment he stopped side a small depression in the ground, and stood gazing at intently for quite a while; then he said, quietly:

"There are people buried here. . . . That is a grave!"

"Oh no, Per Hansa! It can't be possible."

"No doubt about it," he said in the same subdued but positive tone.

1640943

Tönseten and Hans Olsa were so astonished that they uld hardly credit the fact; they came over at once to where r Hansa stood, and gazed down into the hollow.

Hans Olsa bent over and picked up a small stone that his es had lighted on; he turned it around in his hand several nes. . . . "That's a queer-looking piece of stone! I alost believe people have shaped it for some use. . . . Here, e what you make of it, Syvert."

Tönseten's ruddy face grew sober and thoughtful as he amined the object.

"By thunder! It certainly looks as if the Indians had en here! . . . Now isn't that rotten luck?" . . .

"I'm afraid so," said Per Hansa, with a vigorous nod. hen he added, sharply, "But we needn't shout the fact from the house-tops, you know! . . . It takes so very little to scare some folks around here."

He waited no longer but walked hastily down the hill; at the foot he called to Ole, telling him not to drive any farther; but first he turned to Hans Olsa to find out whether they were well across the line between the two quarters.

"No use in building farther away from you than is absolutely necessary," he said. "It's going to be lonesome for the women-folks at times." . . .

. . . Awhile later, Tönseten was dragging his way homeward. For reasons that he wouldn't admit even to himself, he walked a good deal heavier now than when he had climbed the slope that afternoon.

Per Hansa returned with his other neighbour to the wagons, where Beret and the children were waiting. Again he inquired about the line between the two quarters; then asked Beret and Hans Olsa to help pick the best building place; his words, though few and soberly spoken, had in them an unmistakable ring of determination. . . . This vast stretch of beautiful land was to be his—yes, his—and no ghost of a dead Indian would drive him away! . . . His heart began to expand with a mighty exaltation. An emotion he had never felt before filled him and made him walk erect. . . . "Good God!" he panted. "This kingdom is going to be mine!"

IV

Early the next morning Per Hansa and one of the Solum boys set out on the fifty-two-mile journey to Sioux Falls, where Per Hansa filed an application for the quarter-section of land which lay to the north of Hans Olsa's. To confirm the application, he received a temporary deed to the land. The deed was made out in the name of Peder Benjamin Hansen; it contained a description of the land, the conditions which he agreed to fulfil in order to become the owner, and the date, June 6, 1873.

Sörine wanted Beret and the children to stay with her uring the two days that her husband would be away; but e refused the offer with thanks. If they were to get ready home for the summer, she said, she would have to take ld of matters right away.

. . . "For the summer?" exclaimed the other woman, owing her astonishment. "What about the winter, then?" Beret saw that she had uttered a thought which she ought have kept to herself; she evaded the question as best she uld.

During the first day, both she and the boys found so much do that they hardly took time to eat. They unloaded both e wagons, set up the stove, and carried out the table. nen Beret arranged their bedroom in the larger wagon. ith all the things taken out it was quite roomy in there; made a tidy bedroom when everything had been put in der. The boys thought this work great fun, and she rself found some relief in it for her troubled mind. But mething vague and intangible hovering in the air would t allow her to be wholly at ease; she had to stop often and ok about, or stand erect and listen. . . . Was that a sound e heard? . . . All the while, the thought that had struck r yesterday when she had first got down from the wagon, ood vividly before her mind: here there was nothing even hide behind! . . . When the room was finished, and a anket had been hung up to serve as a door, she seemed a tle less conscious of this feeling. But back in the recesses her mind it still was there. . . .

After they had milked the cow, eaten their evening por-dge, and talked awhile to the oxen, she took the boys and nd-Ongen and strolled away from camp. With a common mpulse, they went toward the hill; when they had reached e summit, Beret sat down and let her gaze wander aim-ssly around. . . . In a certain sense, she had to admit to erself, it was lovely up here. The broad expanse stretching way endlessly in every direction, seemed almost like the ean—especially now, when darkness was falling. It re-inded her strongly of the sea, and yet it was very different.

. . . This formless prairie had no heart that beat, no waves that sang, no soul that could be touched . . . or cared. . . .

The infinitude surrounding her on every hand might not have been so oppressive, might even have brought her a measure of peace, if it had not been for the deep silence, which lay heavier here than in a church. Indeed, what was there to break it? She had passed beyond the outposts of civilization; the nearest dwelling places of men were far away. Here no warbling of birds rose on the air, no buzzing of insects sounded;[1] even the wind had died away; the waving blades of grass that trembled to the faintest breath now stood erect and quiet, as if listening, in the great hush of the evening. . . . All along the way, coming out, she had noticed this strange thing: the stillness had grown deeper, the silence more depressing, the farther west they journeyed; it must have been over two weeks now since she had heard a bird sing! Had they travelled into some nameless, abandoned region? Could no living thing exist out here, in the empty, desolate, endless wastes of green and blue? . . . How could existence go on, she thought, desperately? If life is to thrive and endure, it must at least have something to hide behind! . . .

The children were playing boisterously a little way off. What a terrible noise they made! But she had better let them keep on with their play, as long as they were happy. . . . She sat perfectly quiet, thinking of the long, oh, so interminably long march that they would have to make, back to the place where human beings dwelt. It would be small hardship for her, of course, sitting in the wagon; but she pitied Per Hansa and the boys—and then the poor oxen! . . . He certainly would soon find out for himself that a home for men and women and children could never be established in this wilderness. . . . And how could she bring new life into the world out here! . . .

Slowly her thoughts began to centre on her husband; they

[1] Original settlers are agreed that there was neither bird nor insect life on the prairie, with the exception of mosquitoes, the first year that they came.

ew warm and tender as they dwelt on him. She trembled they came. . . .

But only for a brief while. As her eyes darted nervously re and there, flitting from object to object and trying to erce the purple dimness that was steadily closing in, a nse of desolation so profound settled upon her that she emed unable to think at all. It would not do to gaze any nger at the terror out there, where everything was turning grim and awful darkness. . . . She threw herself back the grass and looked up into the heavens. But darkness
d infinitude lay there, also—the sense of utter desolation ll remained. . . . Suddenly, for the first time, she realized e full extent of her loneliness, the dreadful nature of the te that had overtaken her. Lying there on her back, and aring up into the quiet sky across which the shadows of ght were imperceptibly creeping, she went over in her mind ery step of their wanderings, every mile of the distance ey had travelled since they had left home. . . .

First they had boarded the boat at Sandnessjöen. . . .
is boat had carried them southward along the coast. . . .
Namsos there had been a large ship with many white sails, at had taken her, with her dear ones, and sailed away—
at had carried them off relentlessly, farther and farther om the land they knew. In this ship they had sailed for eeks; the weeks had even grown into months; they had emed to be crossing an ocean which had no end. . . .
here had been something almost laughable in this blind urse, steadily fixed on the sunset! When head winds me, they beat up against them; before sweeping fair eezes they scudded along; but always they were wester-g! . . .

. . . At last they had landed in Quebec. There she had lked about the streets, confused and bewildered by a jarn of unintelligible sounds that did not seem like the speech people. . . . Was this the Promised Land? Ah no—it s only the beginning of the real journey. . . . Then some-ing within her had risen up in revolt: I will go no rther! . . .

. . . But they had kept on, just the same—had pushed steadily westward, over plains, through deserts, into towns, and out of them again. . . . One fine day they had stood in Detroit, Michigan. This wasn't the place, either, it seemed. . . . Move on! . . . Once more she had felt the spirit of revolt rising to shout aloud: I will go no farther! . . . But it had been as if a resistless flood had torn them loose from their foundations and was carrying them helplessly along on its current—flinging them here and there, hurling them madly onward, with no known destination ahead.

Farther and farther onward . . . always west. . . . For a brief while there had been a chance to relax once more; they had travelled on water again, and she could hear the familiar splash of waves against the ship's side. This language she knew of old, and did not fear; it had lessened the torture of that section of the journey for her, though they had been subjected to much ill-treatment and there had been a great deal of bullying and brawling on board.

At last the day had arrived when they had landed in Milwaukee. But here they were only to make a new start—to take another plunge into the unknown. . . . Farther, and always farther. . . . The relentless current kept whirling them along. . . . Was it bound nowhere, then? . . . Did it have no end? . . .

In the course of time they had come jogging into a place called Prairie du Chien. . . . Had that been in Wisconsin, or some other place named after savages? . . . It made no difference—they had gone on. They had floundered along to Lansing, in Iowa. . . . Onward again. Finally they had reached Fillmore County, in Minnesota. . . . But even that wasn't the place, it seemed! . . .

. . . Now she was lying here on a little green hillock, surrounded by the open, endless prairie, far off in a spot from which no road led back! . . . It seemed to her that she had lived many lives already, in each one of which she had done nothing but wander and wander, always straying farther away from the home that was dear to her.

She sat up at last, heaved a deep sigh, and glanced around if waking from a dream. . . . The unusual blending of e gentle and forceful in her features seemed to be thrown to relief by the scene in which she sat and the twilight overing about her, as a beautiful picture is enhanced by a ell-chosen frame.

The two boys and their little sister were having great fun here. So many queer things were concealed under the ifts of grass. Store-Hans came running, and brought a ndful of little flat, reddish chips of stone that looked as ough they had been carved out of the solid rock; they were inted at one end and broadened out evenly on both sides, ce the head of a spear. The edges were quite sharp; in e broad end a deep groove had been filed. Ole brought ore of them, and gave a couple to his little sister to play ith. . . . The mother sat for a while with the stones in r lap, where the children had placed them; at last she ok them up, one by one, and examined them closely. . . . nese must have been formed by human hands, she thought.

Suddenly Ole made another rare discovery. He brought r a larger stone, that looked like a sledge hammer; in this e groove was deep and broad.

The mother got up hastily.

"Where are you finding these things?"

The boys at once took her to the place; in a moment she, o, was standing beside the little hollow at the brow of the ll, which the men had discovered the night before; the ueer stones that the children had been bringing her lay attered all around.

"Ola says that the Indians made them!" cried Store-Hans, citedly. "Is it true, mother? . . . Do you suppose they'll er come back?"

"Yes, maybe—if we stay here long enough. . . ." She mained standing awhile beside the hollow; the same ought possessed her that had seized hold of her husband hen he had first found the spot—here a human being lay uried. Strangely enough, it did not frighten her; it only showed her more plainly, in a stronger, harsher light, how unspeakably lonesome this place was.

The evening dusk had now almost deepened into night. It seemed to gather all its strength around her, to close in on every side, to have its centre in the spot where she stood. The wagons had become only a dim speck in the darkness, far, far away; the tent at Hans Olsa's looked like a tuft of grass that had whitened at the top; Tönseten's sod house she was unable to make out at all. . . . She could not bring herself to call aloud to the boys; instead, she walked around the hollow, spoke to them softly, and said that it was time to go home. . . . No, no, they mustn't take the stones with them to-night! But to-morrow they might come up here again to play.

. . . Beret could not go to sleep for a long time that night. At last she grew thoroughly angry with herself; her nerves were taut as bowstrings; her head kept rising up from the pillow to listen—but there was nothing to hear . . . nothing except the night wind, which now had begun to stir.

. . . It stirred with so many unknown things! . . .

V

Per Hansa came home late the following afternoon; he had so many words of praise for what she and the boys had accomplished while he had been gone, that he fairly bewildered her. Now it had taken possession of him again—that indomitable, conquering mood which seemed to give him the right of way wherever he went, whatever he did. Outwardly, at such times, he showed only a buoyant recklessness, as if wrapped in a cloak of gay, wanton levity; but down beneath all this lay a stern determination of purpose, a driving force, so strong that she shrank back from the least contact with it.

To-day he was talking in a steady stream.

"Here is the deed to our kingdom, Beret-girl! See to it that you take good care of the papers. . . . Isn't it stranger than a fairy tale, that a man can have such things here.

st for the taking? . . . Yes—and years after he won e princess, too!" He cocked his head on one side. "I'll l you what, it seems so impossible and unheard of, that can't quite swallow it all yet. . . . What do you say, my ret-girl?"

Beret stood smiling at him, with tears in her eyes, beside e improvised house that she had made; there was little
- her to say. And what would be the use of speaking w? He was so completely wrapped up in his own plans
t he would not listen nor understand. It would be wrong,
, to trouble him with her fears and misgivings. . . . When felt like this he was so tender to her, so cheerful, so loving H kind. . . . How well she knew Per Hansa! . . .

"What are you thinking about it all, my Beret-girl?"
e flung his arm around her, whirled her off her feet, H drew her toward him.

"Oh, Per, it's only this—I'm so afraid out here!" She ggled up against him, as if trying to hide herself. "It's so big and open . . . so empty. . . . Oh, Per! Not other human being from here to the end of the world!"

Per Hansa laughed loud and long, so that she winced
Her the force and meaning of it. "There'll soon be more ople, girl . . . never you fear. . . . By God! there'll n be more people here!"

But suddenly another idea took hold of him. He led her er to the large chest, made her sit down, and stood in nt of her with a swaggering air:

"Now let me tell you what came into my mind yesterday, er I had got the papers. I went right out and bought sacks of potatoes! I felt so good, Beret—and you w how we men from Nordland like potatoes!" he led with a laugh. "This is the point of it: we're not ng to start right in with building a house. The others just foolish to do it." His voice grew low and eager. hey're beginning at the wrong end, you see. For my t, I'm going over to Hans Olsa's this very night and row his plow—and to-morrow morning I shall start break-my ground! Yes, sir! I tell you those potatoes have got to go into the ground at once. Do you hear me, Beret-girl? If the soil out here is half as good as it's cracked up to be, we'll have a fine crop the very first fall! . . . Then I can build later in the summer, you know, when I am able to take my time about it. . . . Just wait, my girl, just wait. It's going to be wonderful; you'll see how wonderful I can make it for you, this kingdom of ours!" He laughed until his eyes were drawn out in two narrow slits. "And no old worn-out, thin-shanked, pot-bellied king is going to come around and tell me what I have to do about it, either!"

He explained to her at great length how he intended to arrange everything and how success would crown his efforts, she sitting there silently on the chest, he standing in front of her, waving his arms; while about them descended the grandeur of the evening. But with all his strength and enthusiasm, and with all her love, he didn't succeed in winning her heart over altogether—no, not altogether. She had heard with her own ears how no bird sang out here; she had seen with her own eyes how, day after day as they journeyed, they had left the abodes of men farther and farther behind. Wasn't she sitting here now, gazing off into an endless blue-green solitude that had neither heart nor soul? . . .

"Do you know," she said, quietly, as she got up once more and leaned close against him, "I believe there is a grave over there on the hill?"

"Why, Beret! Did you find it? Have you been going around brooding over that, too? . . . Don't worry, girl. He'll bring us nothing but good luck, the fellow who lies up there."

"Perhaps. . . . But it seems so strange that some one lies buried in unconsecrated ground right at our very door. How quiet it must be there! . . . The children found so many things to play with, while we were up on the hill last night, that I let them go again to-night. Come, we had better begin to look for them. . . . It is beautiful up there." She sighed, and moved away.

They climbed the hill together, holding each other's hands. There was something in that sad resignation of hers which

e was powerless against. As he walked beside her and eld her hand, he felt as if he could laugh and cry in the me breath. . . . She was so dear, so dear to him. Why uld he never make her understand it fully? It was a range, baffling thing! But perhaps the reason for it lay this: she was not built to wrestle with fortune—she was o fine-grained. . . . Oh, well—he knew one person, at y rate, who stood ready to do the fighting for her!

Per Hansa had so much to think about that night that a ng time passed before he could get to sleep. Now was a od chance to make his plans, while Beret lay at his side, eeping safe and sound; he must utilize every moment now; didn't feel very tired, either.

There seemed to be no end to the things he needed. But irty dollars was all the money he had in the world; and nen he thought of what would have to be bought in the ar future, and of everything that waited to be done, the t grew as long as the distance they had travelled. . . . rst of all, house and barn; that would need doors and ndows. Then food and tobacco; shoes and clothing; and plements—yes, farming implements! If he only had rses and the necessary implements, the whole quarter-ction would soon blossom like a garden. . . . The horses would have to do without, to begin with. But he ought to t at least one more cow before fall came—no dodging that ct. . . . And pigs—he absolutely had to have some pigs r winter! . . . If the potatoes turned out well, there would plenty to feed them on. . . . Then he would buy some ickens, as soon as he could run across any folks who had ickens to sell. Things like that would only be pleasant versions for Beret. . . . There certainly seemed to be no d to all that he needed.

. . . But now came the main hitch in his calculations· ret was going to have a baby again. . . . Only a blessing, course—but what a lot of their time it would take up, st now! . . . Oh, well, she would have to bear the brunt it herself, as the woman usually did. A remarkably brave and clever wife, that she was . . . a woman of tender kindness, of deep, fine fancies—one whom you could not treat like an ordinary clod.

. . . How hard he would strive to make life pleasant for her out here! Her image dominated all the visions which now seemed to come to him of their own accord. . . . The whole farm lay there before him, broken and under cultivation, yielding its fruitful harvests; there ran many horses and cows, both young and grown. And over on the location where to-day he was about to build the sod hut should stand a large dwelling . . . a white house, it would be! Then it would gleam so beautifully in the sun, white all over—but the cornices should be bright green! . . .

When, long ago, Per Hansa had had his first vision of the house, it had been painted white, with green cornices; and these colours had belonged to it in his mind ever since. But the stable, the barn, and all the rest of the outhouses should be painted red, with white cornices—for that gave such a fine effect! . . . Oh yes, that Beret-girl of his should certainly have a royal mansion for herself and her little princess! . . .

VI

As Per Hansa lay there dreaming of the future it seemed to him that hidden springs of energy, hitherto unsuspected even by himself, were welling up in his heart. He felt as if his strength were inexhaustible. And so he commenced his labours with a fourteen-hour day; but soon, as the plans grew clearer, he began to realize how little could be accomplished in that short span of time, with so much work always ahead of him; he accordingly lengthened the day to sixteen hours, and threw in another hour for good measure; at last he found himself wondering if a man couldn't get along with only five hours of rest, in this fine summer weather.

His waking dreams passed unconsciously into those of sleep; all that night a pleasant buoyancy seemed to be lift-him up and carrying him along; at dawn, when he opened eyelids, morning was there to greet him—the morning a glorious new day. . . . He saw that it was already ad daylight; with a guilty start, he came wide awake. avens! he might have overslept himself—on this morning! . He jumped into his clothes, and found some cold ridge to quiet his hunger for the time being; then he ried out, put the yoke on the oxen, and went across to ns Olsa's to fetch the plow. . . . Over there no life was ring yet. Well, maybe they could afford to sleep late in morning; but he had arrived five days behind the others, had just been delayed for two days more; they had a start over him already. His heart sang as he thought r he would have to hurry! . . . He led the oxen care- y, trying to make as little noise around the tent as pos- e.

Dragging the plow, he drove out for some distance to- d the hillock, then stopped and looked around. This was good a place as anywhere to start breaking. . . . He ightened up the plow, planted the share firmly in the und, and spoke to the oxen: "Come now, move along, lazy rascals!" He had meant to speak gruffly, but the ll of joy that surged over him as he sank the plow in his land for the first time, threw such an unexpected tone gentleness into his voice that the oxen paid no attention ; he found that he would have to resort to more powerful ouragement; but even with the goad it was hard to make n bend to the yoke so early in the morning. After a little, rever, they began to stretch their muscles. Then they e off; the plow moved . . . sank deeper . . . the first row was breaking. . . .

t would have gone much easier now if Ole had only n there to drive the oxen, so that he could have given whole attention to the plow. But never mind that! . . . boy ought to sleep for at least another hour; the day ld be plenty long enough for him, before it was through. Young bulls have tender sinews—though for one of age, Ole was an exceptionally able youngster.

That first furrow turned out very crooked for Per Hansa; he made a long one of it, too. When he thought he ha gone far enough and halted the oxen, the furrow came winc ing up behind him like a snake. He turned around, drov the oxen back in the opposite direction, and laid anothe furrow up against the one he had already struck. . . . At th starting point again, he surveyed his work ruefully. Wel the second furrow wasn't any crookeder than the first, at a events! . . . When he had made another round he let th oxen stand awhile; taking the spade which he had brough out, he began to cut the sod on one side of the breakin into strips that could be handled. This was to be his build ing material. . . . Field for planting on the one hand, soc for a house on the other—that was the way to plow! . . Leave it to Per Hansa—he was the fellow to have everythin figured out beforehand!

By breakfast time he had made a fine start. No soone had he swallowed the last morsel than he ordered both th boys to turn to, hitched the oxen to the old homemad wagon, and off they all went together toward the field, Pe Hansa leading the way. . . . "You'd better cook the kettle full to-day!" he shouted back, as they were leaving. "We'r going to punish a lot of food when we come in!"

Now Per Hansa began working in real earnest. He an Store-Hans, with plow and oxen, broke up the land; Ol used the hoe, but the poor fellow was having a hard tim of it. The sod, which had been slumbering there undis turbed for countless ages, was tough of fibre and would nc give up its hold on the earth without a struggle. It almos had to be turned by main strength, piece by piece; it was dark brownish colour on the under side—a rich, black moul that gave promise of wonderful fertility; it actually gleame and glistened under the rays of the morning sun, wher the plow had carved and polished its upturned face. . . Ole toiled on, settling and straightening the furrows as bes he could, now and then cutting out the clods that fell un evenly. When Per Hansa had made a couple of rounds, h let the oxen stand awhile to catch their breath, and cam er to Ole to instruct him. "This is the way to do it!" said, seizing the hoe. "Watch me, now—like this!" He wed away till the clods were flying around him. . . . Then they quit work at noon a good many furrows lay retched out on the slope, smiling up at the sun; they were so able to bring home with them a full wagonload of building material; at coffee time they brought another; at supper other. But when, arriving home at the end of the day, ey found that supper was not quite ready, Per Hansa felt at he must go after still another load; they had better make e of every minute of time!

VII

He began building the house that same evening.

"You ought to rest, Per Hansa!" Beret pleaded. "Please e a little common sense!"

"Rest—of course! That's just what I propose to do! . Come along, now, all hands of you; you can't imagine nat fun this is going to be. . . . Just think of it—a new use on our own estate! I don't mean that you've got to ork, you know; but come along and watch the royal manon rise!"

They all joined in, nevertheless . . . couldn't have kept eir hands off. It gave them such keen enjoyment that ey worked away until they could no longer see to place the ips of sod. Then Per Hansa called a halt—that was ough for one day. They had laboured hard and faithfully; ell, they would get their wages in due time, every last one them—but he couldn't bother with such trifles just now! . . . That night sleep overpowered him at once; he was o tired even to dream.

From now on Per Hansa worked on the house every orning before breakfast, and every evening as soon as he d finished supper. The whole family joined in the task nen they had nothing else to do; it seemed like a fascinatg game.

To the eyes of Tönseten and Hans Olsa, it appeared as if nothing short of witchcraft must be at work on Pe Hansa's quarter section; in spite of the fact that he an his entire family were breaking ground in the fields the whol day long, a great sod house shot up beside the wagon, like a enormous mushroom.

Per Hansa plowed and harrowed, delved and dug; he buil away at the house, and he planted the potatoes; he had such a zest for everything and thought it all such fun that h could hardly bear to waste a moment in stupid sleep. It wa Beret who finally put a check on him. One morning, as h threw off the blanket at dawn, on the point of jumping u in his reckless way, she lay there awake, waiting for him The moment he stirred, she put her arms lovingly aroun him and told him that he must stay in bed awhile longer This would never do, she said; he ought to remember tha he was only a human being. . . . She begged him so gently and soothingly that he gave in at last and stayed in bed wit her. But he was ill at ease over the loss of time. It wouldn' take long to lay a round of sod, and every round helped. . . This Beret-girl of his meant well enough, but she didn' realize the multitude of things that weighed on his mind— things that couldn't wait, that had to be attended to imme diately!

. . . Yes, she was an exceptional woman, this Beret o his; he didn't believe that her like existed anywhere els under the sun. During the last two days she had hurrie through her housework, and then, taking And-Ongen by th hand, had come out in the field with them; she had let th child roam around and play in the grass while she herse had joined in their labour; she had pitched in beside them and taken her full term like any man. It had all been don to make things easier for him . . . and now she was lying awake here, just to look after him!

. . . He thought of other things that she had done. When they had harrowed and hoed sufficient seed ground, Beret had looked over her bundles and produced all kinds of seeds— he couldn't imagine how or where she had got them—turnips, and carrots, and onions, and tomatoes, and melons, even

. What a wife she was! . . . Well, he had better stay in l and please her this time, when she had been so clever l thoughtful about everything.

However it was accomplished, on Per Hansa's estate they l a field all broken and harrowed and seeded down, and arge house ready for thatching, by the time that Hans sa and the Solum boys had barely finished thatching their ıses and started the plowing. Tönseten, though, was ead of him with the breaking—Per Hansa had to accept t—and was now busy planting his potatoes. But Syvert l every reason to be in the lead; his house had been all dy to move into when they had arrived. That little stable ich he had built wasn't more than a decent day's work
- an able man. And he had horses, too. . . . Of course, h things gave him a big advantage!

They finished planting the big field at Per Hansa's late one ernoon; all the potatoes that he had brought home from ux Falls had been cut in small pieces and tucked away in
- ground. . . . "Only one eye to each piece!" he had rned Beret as she sat beside him, cutting them up.
hat's enough for such rich soil." . . . The other seed, ich she had provided with such splendid forethought, had o been planted. The field looked larger than it really was.
stood out clearly against the fresh verdure of the hillside;
m a little distance it appeared as if some one had sewn lark brown patch on a huge green cloth. . . . That patch ked mighty good to Per Hansa as he stood surveying scene, his whole being filled with the sense of completed
ort. Here he had barely arrived in a new country; yet eady he had got more seed into the ground than on any evious year since Beret and he had started out for them-
ves. . . . Just wait! What couldn't he do another year!

"Well, Beret-girl," he said, "we've cleaned up a busy ring season, all right! To-night we ought to have an tra-fine dish of porridge, to bless what has been put into ground." He stood there with sparkling eyes, admiring wonderful field.

Beret was tired out with the labour she had undergone;

her back ached as if it would break. She, too, was looking at the field, but the joy he felt found no response in her.

. . . I'm glad that he is happy, she thought, sadly. Perhaps in time I will learn to like it, too. . . . But she did not utter the thought; she merely took the child by the hand, turned away, and went back to their wagon-home. There she measured out half of the milk that Rosie had given that morning, dipped some grits from the bag and prepared the porridge, adding water until it was thin enough. Before she served it up she put a small dab of butter in each dish, like a tiny eye that would hardly keep open; then she sprinkled over the porridge a small portion of sugar; this was all the luxury she could afford. Indeed, her heart began to reproach her even for this extravagance. But when she saw the joyful faces of the boys, and heard Per Hansa's exclamations over her merits as a housekeeper, she brightened up a little, cast her fears to the wind, and sprinkled on more sugar from the bag. . . . Then she sat down among them, smiling and happy; she was glad that she hadn't told them how her back was aching. . . .

. . . They all worked at the house building that night as long as they could see.

VIII

Per Hansa's house certainly looked as if it were intended for a royal mansion. When Tönseten saw it close at hand for the first time he exclaimed:

"Will you please inform me, Per Hansa, what the devil you think you're building? Is it just a house, or is it a church and parsonage rolled in one? . . . Have you lost your senses altogether, man? You won't be able to get a roof over this crazy thing in a month of Sundays! . . . Why, damn it all, there aren't willows enough in this whole region to thatch a half of it! You might just as well tear it down again, for all the good it will do."

"The hell you say!" cried Per Hansa, genially. "But there it stands, as big as Billy-be-damned, so what are you going ido about it? . . . The notion I had was this: I might as ll build for my sons, too, while I was about it. Then when y got married and needed more room they could thatch ew section any time. . . . What ails you, Syvert? Isn't re plenty of sod for roofing, all the way from here to the ific coast?"

But Tönseten took a serious view of the affair:

"I tell you, Per Hansa, there's no sense in such a perform-ce. It isn't the sod, it's the poles—you know it damned ll! . . . You'd better go right ahead and tear it down as t as ever you can!"

"Oh, well, I suppose I'll have to, then," said Per Hansa, rly.

As a matter of fact, it was hardly to be wondered at that nseten grew excited when he saw this structure; it differed ically from the one he had built and from all the others t he had ever seen. He wondered if such a silly house this could be found anywhere else in the whole country. . His own hut measured fourteen by sixteen feet; the one t the Solum boys were building was only fourteen feet h way; Hans Olsa had been reckless and had laid his out nteen feet long and sixteen feet wide. . . . But look this house of Per Hansa's—twenty-eight feet long and hteen feet wide! Moreover, it had two rooms, one of m eighteen by eighteen, the other eighteen by ten. The ms were separated by a wall; one had a door opening ard the south, the other a door opening toward the east. o doors in a sod hut! My God! what folly! In the aller room the sod even had been taken up, so that the r level there was a foot below that of the larger room. at was the sense of that? . . . If we don't look out, ught Tönseten, this crazy man will start building a tower it, too!

Things surely looked serious to Tönseten. In the first ce, Per Hansa plainly was getting big-headed; heavens earth, it was nothing but an ordinary sod hut that he s building! In the second place, it wasn't a practical eme. If he were to search till doomsday, he wouldn't be able to find enough willows for the thatching. Why, h might just as well thatch the whole firmament, and be don with it! . . . As soon as he had looked his fill, Tönsete trotted right over to Hans Olsa's, told him all about it, an asked him to go and reason with the man. . . . But, nc Hans Olsa didn't care to meddle in that affair. Per Hans had a considerable family already; it might grow in the nex few years; at any rate, he needed a fairly large house Above all, he wasn't the man to bite off more than he coul chew.

"But that's just it—he doesn't know what he's bitten off He doesn't know anything at all about building a house!" With these drastic words, Tönseten went directly to the Solum boys; they had been born and brought up in America and knew what was what. Now they must go, right away and talk to Per Hansa about this crazy building that he was putting up! The only way out of it that he could think of was for them and himself—and maybe Hans Olsa—to go in a body and show him what to do, and help him to build a house then and there. The thing that he had put up was frankly impossible; the poor man would ruin himself before he got a decent start! . . .

To his great disappointment, the Solum boys wouldn't go, either. It was Per Hansa's own business, they said, what sort of a house he wanted to build for himself. So Tönseten had to give it up as a bad job. He shook his head solemnly. . . . A damned shame, that a perfectly good man had to go to ruin through sheer folly!

Per Hansa had put a great deal of thought into this matter of building a house; ever since he had first seen a sod hut he had pondered the problem. On the day that he was coming home from Sioux Falls a brilliant idea had struck him—an idea which had seemed perhaps a little queer, but which had grown more attractive the longer he turned it over in his mind. How would it do to build house and barn under one roof? It was to be only a temporary shelter, anyway—just a sort of makeshift, until he could begin on his real mansion. This plan would save time and labour, and both the house and barn would be warmer for being together. . . . He had ague recollection of having heard how people in the olden ys used to build their houses in that way—rich people, en! It might not be fashionable any longer; but it was far m foolish, just the same.

t will go hard with Beret, he thought; she won't like it. t after a while he picked up courage to mention his plan ner.

. . House and barn under the same roof? . . . She said more, but fell into deep and troubled thought. . . . Man l beast in one building? How could one live that way? . At first it seemed utterly impossible to her; but then thought of how desolate and lonesome everything was e and of what a comfortable companion Rosie might be dark evenings and during the long winter nights. She ddered, and answered her husband that it made no differe to her whichever way he built, so long as it was snug l warm; but she said nothing about the real reason that changed her mind.

his answer made Per Hansa very happy.

Beret-girl, you are the most sensible woman that I know! .. Of course it's better, all around, for us to build that y!"

He, too, had reasons that he kept to himself. . . . Now he uld get ahead of both Hans Olsa and the Solum boys! ne of them had even begun to think of building a barn ; while according to his plan, his barn would be finished en his house was done.

IX

One evening Per Hansa came over with his oxen to Hans a's to borrow his new wagon; the time had come to get poles for the thatching. The others had been able to ner what they needed along the banks of a creek some ten es to the southward, where a fringe of scattering willows w; but it was small stock and a scanty supply at that; r roofs were certainly none too strong, and might not hold up through the next winter. . . . Per Hansa had a bigger and more original scheme in mind. If conditions were really as bad as Tönseten had made out, he'd have to find something besides willow poles for rafters on that house of his. The busy season of spring was over; now he proposed to rest on his oars awhile . . . take a little time to nose around the prairie at his leisure. He had been told that the Sioux River was only twenty-five or thirty miles away; big stands of timber were reported to lie in that direction and several settlements of Trönders,[1] who had lived there for a number of years; many other interesting things would turn up, of course—things that he hadn't heard about; he wanted to see it all and get a running idea of the whole locality. He confided to Hans Olsa where he was going but asked him not to mention it to anyone else. . . . "We might as well keep this matter to ourselves, you know. Besides, something has got to be done about getting fuel for the winter."

He brought the wagon home that evening, merely explaining that he and Store-Hans were going out to gather wood. Ole would have to look after the farm while they were away, and take the full responsibility on his shoulders. Store-Hans, who had been chosen to go on the trip, was overjoyed at the news; but his brother was reduced to the verge of tears at such an outrageous injustice. The idea of taking that boy along, and letting a grown man loaf around the house with nothing to do! For the first time his faith in his father's judgment was shattered. . . . And the situation grew worse and worse as Ole watched the extensive preparations for the trip; it looked for all the world as if they intended to move out West! The father was taking along a kettle, and was measuring out supplies of flour, and salt, and coffee, and milk, besides a big heap of flatbröd and plenty of other food. But, heaviest blow of all, the rifle—Old Maria—was brought out from the big chest! Ole wept at that in sheer anger. Ax, rope, and sacks, too—everything was going! . . . And on top of it all, this youngster who wasn't y behind the ears yet had grown so conceited that he ouldn't deign to talk to his brother; he kept fussing and irking around his father all the time, speaking to him in v, confidential tones, and pushing himself to the front on ery occasion! He seemed to be bubbling over with foolish estions. Shouldn't they take this along, and this, and s? . . . But when at last he came dragging a piece of ain, even Per Hansa had to laugh outright. "That's the boy, w! I might have forgotten the chain. And how could go to the woods without a chain, I'd like to know?"

[1] People from the district of Trondhjem, Norway.

Beret got the food ready for the journey. Her face wore sad, sober expression. . . . Yes, of course, the house must ve a roof; she knew that perfectly well. How could they e in a house without a roof? . . . But now he was going be away for another two-day stretch—two whole days d a night! . . . It wasn't so bad in the daytime . . . but night . . . !

"You'd better take the children with you and go over Mother Sörrina's to-morrow evening," Per Hansa adsed her, cheerfully. "You can spend the whole evening ere, you know, visiting and talking. It'll make the time ss quicker, and you won't be so lonesome. . . . You do at, Beret!"

To this suggestion she answered neither yes nor no. In r heart she knew very well that she wouldn't follow his vice. She never could forget that evening of his trip to ux Falls, when she and the children had come down e hill toward the wagons; the air of the place had suddenly ed with terror and mystery. The wagons had floated like ey specks in the dusk; and all at once it had seemed as if e whole desolation of a vast continent were centring there d drawing a magic circle about their home. She had even en the intangible barrier with her own eyes . . . had seen clearly . . . had had to force herself to step across it. . Now she went on getting the food ready for them as ell as she could; but from her sad lips there came not a rd.

This was destined to be a memorable journey, both for those who went and for those who stayed at home. . . . Before it was over the latter were in a panic of apprehension and fear. The second day passed as the first had done; the second night, too; the third day came . . . noon, but no one in sight.

Beret had not really begun to expect them until sometime during the second day; Per Hansa had told her not to begin looking before they came in sight. Nevertheless, she had found herself unconsciously doing it shortly after dinner on the very first day. She knew that it was foolish—they hadn't even got there yet; but she couldn't refrain from scanning the sky line in the quarter where they had disappeared. . . . She went to bed with the children early that evening.

The following evening she took them up on the hill; they sat there silently, gazing eastward over the plain. From this elevation her sight seemed to take flight and carry a long, long distance. . . . In the eastern sky the evening haze was gathering; it merged slowly into the purple dusk, out of which an intangible, mysterious presence seemed to be creeping closer and closer upon them. They sat trying to pierce it with their gaze; but neither wagon nor oxen crossed the line of their vision. . . . Ole took no interest in keeping watch; it was more fun for him to look for queer stones around the grave. . . . When the day was well-nigh dead and nothing had appeared, Beret suddenly felt that she must talk to some one to-night . . . hear some human voice other than those of the two children. Almost in spite of herself, she directed her steps toward Hans Olsa's.

—Hadn't Per Hansa returned yet?

—No. She couldn't imagine what had become of him! He surely ought to have been home by this time.

—Oh, well, she mustn't worry; he had probably travelled a long way on this trip; no doubt he had made use of the opportunity to look around for winter fuel.

—Winter fuel? . . . She had never given a thought to that before; but of course they would need wood if they were going to stay through the winter. It suddenly occurred her how much there was for Per Hansa to plan about and orry over; but she also felt a twinge of jealousy because had not confided in her. . . . Winter fuel? Of course; was the thing they needed most of all!

Mother Sörine was well aware that her neighbour did not ve any courage to spare. She realized, too, how lonesome must be for Beret, to sleep over there in the wagon with ly the children. As the visitors were leaving she got up, lled her daughter, and insisted on accompanying them back the wagon. They chatted gaily and freely all the way . . and that night there was no magic circle to step ross!

Some time after noon on the third day Per Hansa and ore-Hans came home with a load so big that the oxen re just barely able to sag up the slope with it. It was e an incident out of a fairy tale, that famous load. There s a stout timber for the ridgepole, there were crossbeams d scantlings, and rafters for the roof; but Ole only sneered such prosaic things. Was that all they had gone for, he'd e to know? Farther down in the load, however, lay bundles of young trees; their tops had been trimmed , and the soil had been carefully wrapped around their ts with strips of bark. . . . "Those are to be planted ound the house!" Store-Hans explained. "Would you lieve it, Mother—in this bundle there are twelve plum es! They grow great big plums! We met a man who d us all about them." Store-Hans caught his breath from eer excitement. . . . There were still stranger things in at load. In the back of the wagon, as the father unloaded, opening almost like a small room was gradually revealed. re lay two great bags—two bags brimful of curious icles. One of them evidently contained fish; the other emed to hold the flayed carcass of a calf; at least, Ole ought so, and wanted to know where it had come from.

"Calf!" exclaimed Store-Hans. "What makes you think s a calf?" . . .

Per Hansa winked slyly at his travelling companion; the nk warned him that he'd better say no more—for a little while! . . . Store-Hans assumed a knowing silence; but it could be seen with half an eye that he was bursting with important secrets. At last he was no longer able to contain himself.

. . . "Antelope!" he burst out, ecstatically.

Beret watched with speechless admiration the unloading of all the wonderful things that they had brought; she was so overjoyed to have her dear ones with her again that she could have burst into hysterical tears; as she stood beside the oxen she stroked their necks fondly, murmuring in a low voice that they were nice fellows to have hauled home such a heavy load.

. . . "Well, there!" said Per Hansa at last, when he had cleared the wagon. "Now, this is the idea: Store-Hans and I have figured on having fresh fish to-day, cooked in regular Nordland fashion, with soup and everything. We nearly killed ourselves, and the beasts, too, to get here in time. . . . Beret, what the devil have we got to put all this meat and fish into?"

Store-Hans ate that day as if he could never get enough; there seemed to be no bottom to the boy. . . . When he had finished the father chased him off to bed at once; and strange to say, he wasn't at all unwilling though it was only the latter part of the afternoon. When evening came the mother tried to shake life into him again, but without success; once he roused enough to sit up in bed, but couldn't get so far as to take off his clothes; the next moment he had thrown himself flat once more and was sleeping like a log.

As time went on this first expedition of Per Hansa's came to be of great consequence to the new settlement on Spring Creek. . . . In the first place, there were all the trees that he had brought home and planted. This alone excited Tönseten's enthusiasm to such a pitch that he was for leaving at once to get a supply of his own; but Hans Olsa and the Solum boys advised him to wait until the coming fall, so Tönseten reluctantly had to give up still another plan.

. . . But there were other things to do when fall came,

l several years went by before the others had followed
- Hansa's lead. This is the reason why, in the course time, a stout grove of trees began to grow up around
- Hansa's house before anything larger than a bush was be seen elsewhere in the whole neighbourhood.

But the most important result of all, perhaps, was the uaintance with the Trönders eastward on the Sioux er, which sprang out of this journey. Amid these strange roundings, confronted by new problems, the two tribes, önder and Helgelander, met in a quite different relaıship than on the Lofoten fishing grounds. Here they re glad enough to join forces in their common fight against unknown wilderness. . . .

. . The Great Plain watched them breathlessly. . .

III. "Rosie!—Rosie!"

I

THE food supply was steadily vanishing. Bags and sacks yawned empty and had nothing to yield. The settlers shared freely with one another as long as they had anything left; but even at Hans Olsa's, where plenty usually reigned, the food at last began to give out. Among the menfolk a crumb of tobacco was as rare as gold. . . . High time that they took the situation in hand and did something about it! Besides, the season was getting so far advanced that they would soon have to start in haying. No two ways about it—they must make a trip to town.

All the men, accordingly—Per Hansa, and Tönseten, and Hans Olsa, and the two Solum boys—met together one Sunday to discuss the matter. A trip to town in those days was a serious affair, which had to be planned carefully from beginning to end. The seventy or eighty miles through desolate country was in itself no trifle; one couldn't expect to be back in less than four days, even with horses. And under pressure of time, it was hard to accomplish everything that one wanted to do. Provisions of all sorts must be replenished for the next season; first of all came food, and after that clothing; then tools and farming implements, as far as their money would go. If it wouldn't go far enough they would have to find some other way out of the fix, but they must hold down to essentials in order to keep alive. . . . As yet, no one in the Spring Creek settlement was in a position to carry any produce along, to be sold for cash or given in exchange for wares. But they all looked forward to the time when this would be possible; it would be harder work to haul a load both ways, of course; but aat a help it would be—and what a satisfaction—to have eir own products to barter!

They at once agreed that some of the menfolk would have stay at home, in case anything untoward happened. . . . It s a singular thing, not a soul in this little colony ever t wholly at ease, though no one referred to the fact or red to frame the thought in words. All of a sudden, apprently without any cause, a vague, nameless dread would ze hold of them; it would shake them for a while like an ack of nerves; or again, it might fill them with restless prehension, making them quiet and cautious in everything ey did. They seemed to sense an unseen force around em. . . . The men grew taciturn under the strain; they ould cast about for some task or other on which they could rk off the spell. With the women it found an outlet in lk; they often became extravagantly loud and boisterous er nothing at all. Few realized what this strange feeling s; none of them would have admitted that he was afraid. . . . Yes, God defend them! Man's strength availed but le out here. They had already experienced it more than ce. Terrible storms would come up—so suddenly, with ch appalling violence! . . . Mother Sörine had reason to frightened of these storms. Less than a week ago their nt had been carried away in one of them; Sörine, trapped side and half choked, had been swept along with the cans. Hans Olsa had laid the tent rope across his shoulder, anted his feet solidly in the ground, and summoned all his ant strength; but he had been whirled away like a tuft of ool. It had turned out all right, however; no one was riously hurt . . . this time.

And then, the Indians! . . . "Injuns," as the red children the great plain were called in common speech. Kjersti, nseten's wife, didn't mind the storms so much; they never mmitted inhuman outrages . . . weren't out for your scalp, any rate! But fear of the Indians was ever vividly esent in her mind. Not a day passed that she didn't search e sky line many times. . . . Why, one of the savages tually lay buried over on Per Hansa's land! And where the dead had their abode, the living were sure to come. . . . Since she had learned of the grave she was always on the lookout. . . .

Truth to tell, her fear of the Indians was very natural. She and Syvert had heard the tale of the terrors of '62 so often that they could have repeated it word for word, as if from an open book. When they were living in Fillmore County, Minnesota, two refugees from the Norway Lake massacre had drifted into the place; the story of the horrors they had undergone had taken on new and grewsome details as it passed from mouth to mouth; out here now on the open prairie, where no hiding place could be found, the form in which Kjersti remembered it had assumed the fantastic proportions of a myth.

Tönseten, however, wasn't a bit afraid of the Indians—not he! Who ever heard of such nonsense? Why should he or anyone else fear them, now that they had become peaceful and civilized? He tried his best to instill this idea into the others. . . . Per Hansa would sit listening to Tönseten with a quizzical smile on his face. "That's right, Syvert—go on," he would agree. "All the Indians have turned into honest-to-God gentlemen these last ten years, with red skull-caps, and wooden shoes, and long pipes, and everything else they need. It's no trick at all, you know, for a savage to learn fine manners, as crowded with folks to teach him as it is out here!" . . . From the Trönders on the Sioux River, Per Hansa had learned a great deal of valuable information about the Indians; he had heard of a place, not very far away, called Flandreau or some such outlandish name, where they had a permanent colony; west from this place an Indian trail ran all the way through to Nebraska, and along this route the red man was said to make his yearly journeys. More than likely, Per Hansa thought, his own quarter-section lay directly in their path; he inferred this from the grave on the hill and from what he had heard. . . . If it were true, the fact would be certain to come to light before the summer was over. In the meanwhile—well, no use to cross a bridge until you came to it.

The men never spoke of the Indians while the womenfolk re around. But at other times, whenever the subject came for discussion, Ole and Store-Hans stood listening with en mouths. . . . The grave where they found the stones d now begun to strike a chill into their hearts; but it also erted a strange and irresistible fascination.

. . . So here they all were, afraid of something or other. t the women were the worst off; Kjersti feared the dians, Sörine the storms; and Beret, poor thing, feared th—and feared the very air.

The outcome of their deliberations that Sunday was only at might have been expected; it seemed the logical thing r Hans Olsa and Tönseten and Henry Solum, each of om owned horses and wagon, to make up the party for e journey. That would give three men and three separate ms; such a caravan ought to be able to haul home on one p whatever the settlement could afford to buy.

Per Hansa was badly out of sorts that day; every word at he let fall had a bitter sting to it; he said little and morose and silent most of the time. In his eyes, the ole affair had the appearance of having been settled be-rehand. He and the other Solum boy were to stay at home d look after the settlement; that was the plan, though it dn't been stated in outright terms. It looked to Per Hansa e a pretty mean piece of business. . . . For his part, he k it as a matter of course that he was a better man for e trip to town than Syvert Tönseten or Henry Solum—ither of whom, God knows, had any more wits than he uld get along with! . . . In all their talk, no one had even nted at that side of the question. And certainly Per Hansa asn't the sort of man to force himself down anybody's roat. . . . But, by God! it was disgusting to have to lie ound the house with the womenfolk while the others were f on such a fine expedition! . . . The thirst for adventure as burning in his blood.

When the party left on Monday morning Per Hansa was a towering ill humour; he rose with the others at dawn, oke Ole, and hitched the oxen to the plow. On that day he broke up an acre and a half of prairie, with only the crude implements at hand—a record that stood for many years in that part of the country.

But at quitting time that night, when he paced around the field and discovered what an enormous day's work he had done, he felt so elated that he began to whistle the tune of an old ballad. . . . Just look at that! If they didn't hurry back, he'd have the whole farm broken up before they arrived. . . . By God! he'd show them! He'd give them a chance to see for themselves who was the better man!

II

The next day he did not drive himself so hard; but he turned off a good day's work, just the same.

Per Hansa was again in a good humour that afternoon as he and Ole sauntered home from the field; he felt that during this interval he would easily get ahead of Tönseten. Ole's tired feet dragged at every step; his voice was hoarse from steadily shouting at the oxen.

They had not got far on their way home when Store-Hans came running out to meet them; he began shouting as soon as he caught sight of them, and arrived all out of breath.

"Dad . . . quick . . . people are coming!" . . .

The news sounded so incredible that Ole stopped short in his tracks and stared at his brother with his mouth wide open, but the father only laughed as he looked indulgently at the boy.

"Of course people are coming!" he said with a chuckle. . . . "And you'll grow up to be a man, too, some day—at about the same rate, I guess! You've both got a long distance yet to travel."

But Store-Hans was too excited to be thrown off the track by his father's kindly sarcasm.

"Look! . . . look there!" he cried, pointing toward the southwest. . . . "Mother thinks they may be Indians!" . . .

Per Hansa took in the whole western horizon in one swift nce . . . "Huh!" he grunted . . . and immediately be- to walk faster. The longer he looked, the more haste he He. At last he was taking such mighty strides that the s had to run in order to keep up with him.

Beret was standing just beyond the wagon, holding And- gen in her arms.

"They have come," she said in a calm voice; but her sad, gned face was pale and drawn.

"Well, don't stand there! . . . Go and look after the cook- as if nothing had happened!" . . . He spoke rapidly, h a metallic ring in his voice.

n an instant he was over at the new house, which as was only half thatched. The boys followed close at his ls; he spoke to them in quick, low tones; all his words the same hard, metallic ring.

"Hans, run over to Sam's and tell him what's up. . . . rry, now!"

"Yes." . . . The boy hesitated.

"Hurry, I said!"

"Yes, sir!" . . . Store-Hans found his legs and was off lightning.

Per Hansa turned to Ole. "You go and get Old Maria. u'll find her in the big chest—and something to load her n in the till. Stand the gun and everything just inside door here. . . . And listen"—his face was hard set— hen I whistle, I want her—but not before! . . . Are you aid?"

"N-n-no." . . . Ole ran to execute the order.

Per Hansa began to work away at the thatching as if ning unusual were going on; but his eyes were steadily d on the approaching train. Little by little, as he watched, grew calmer; the look of anxiety slowly faded away from features, to be replaced by the half-sly, half-roguish ex- ssion of his lighter moods. . . . No war party, this— ning but harmless families roaming over the plain!

Just then Ole arrived with the rifle.

"Never mind," said Per Hansa. He was laughing now. back and hide those things where you found them. . . .

That fellow Store-Hans is a regular little rascal—the way he nearly scared us out of our wits!"

"But don't you want the gun, Father?"

"No, I guess not. . . . Go and put her back—then come and run an errand for me."

The boy ran inside, and returned in a moment empty-handed. Per Hansa was sitting on the edge of the roof; he kept looking off to the westward as he gave his orders:

"Run over and tell Sörrina that the Indians are coming, but don't frighten the life out of her. Tell her it's only a wandering tribe—just peaceful people like ourselves. . . . And tell her they are likely to camp for the night over here on the hill; if she is afraid, she can stay with us. . . . Don't get off a lot of wild talk, now. Be sensible!"

Almost before he had heard the words, Ole was gone. . . . Per Hansa came down to the ground, heaved an armful of sod up on the roof, and then climbed back unconcernedly to his work.

The band of Indians crawled slowly toward them out of the west. Per Hansa counted the teams—fourteen in all, he made it—but he couldn't be certain of the exact number; they drove close together and were headed straight in the direction of the settlement. . . . No doubt about it any longer—here lay an old Indian trail!

He was kneeling on the roof awhile later, trying to fit a strip of sod in place, when suddenly a figure stood below him; it had appeared so swiftly and silently that Per Hansa was startled in spite of himself. . . The next moment he saw that it was Sam Solum, frightened and excited, gun in hand. He had run so fast that Store-Hans had been left far behind.

"You must be going hunting to-night," Per Hansa observed, dryly.

"Haven't you seen 'em? . . . Don't you know . . . ?" Sam had to stop to catch his breath.

"Seen who?"

"The Indians! . . . They're right on top of us!"

"I see you look like the scared fool you are, all right! . . .

hat are you ramming around with that rattletrap of a n of yours for? Put it out of sight as quick as you can!
nen come here and help me with the thatching. . . . Store-ans, you'd better go and stay with mother."

Sam did as he was bid, without half understanding; he ok his gun inside the house, stood it against the wall, and me out again; in front of the door he paused, staring openouthed at the approaching train. . . . Seated above him the roof, Per Hansa glanced alternately westward and wn at the puzzled youth.

"I suppose we ought to warn Kjersti—she's always so ittish," he said with a grin. "Why don't you go down d tell her that our red neighbours are coming? . . . But n't scare the wits out of the poor woman!"

Sam hesitated; the task obviously wasn't to his liking.
. . . "Or should we wait, and let the Indians take her lp?"

At these words Sam jumped, then suddenly broke into run.

Per Hansa laughed heartily as he watched him go.

"Hey, there! Don't tear off as if your pants had caught e!" he shouted. "You needn't be in such an awful sweat out Kjersti, either!"

But Kjersti herself had seen the enemy; she must have en on the lookout, as usual. . . . At that moment she ve in sight on the slope of the hill, leading her cow.

At the same time Ole arrived, with Sörine and the girl se behind him; but Sörine, unfortunately, hadn't thought her cow, which was grazing off on the prairie to the west-rd, some distance from Hans Olsa's house.

Soon they were all gathered in a little knot—the three men, Ole, and the Solum boy; but Store-Hans felt that it uld be safer with his father, and had gone over to where r Hansa was still working. . . . Kjersti was moaning and iling because her Syvert was away at a time when the rd sent such tribulations upon her; Mother Sörine was mforting her as best she could, saying that, after all,

Indians were only people—human beings . . . just human beings! . . . Beret listened in stony silence to it all.

At last Per Hansa took a quick slide down from the roof and went over to the agitated group.

"What have we here—a sewing circle? . . . By George! It seems to me that three nice modest girls like you oughtn't to be standing around and making eyes at strange menfolk! They've got their own women with 'em, too. . . . Maybe the squaws would have a word or two to say about that!"

Per Hansa's sally broke the tension; Beret immediately resumed her preparations for supper, and Mother Sörine began to help her; Kjersti found a pail and milked her cow; and Per Hansa himself went back to his roof and laid a few more strips of sod before supper was ready.

III

. . . While they sat waiting for the porridge to cool, they watched with anxious attention the Indian band as it crept up the slope of the hill toward the crest. The foremost team reached the summit, passed some distance beyond it on the other side, and came to a halt; at that they all drew up, the whole train forming a crescent around the brow of the hill, facing the house of Per Hansa. One by one the horses were unhitched from the rickety wagons and turned loose on the prairie. . . . Per Hansa's face brightened still more as he noticed this move. People who did a thing like that could have no evil intentions!

Just then, however, Sörine's cow, which was still grazing some distance off on the prairie, suddenly seemed to go crazy. She bellowed loud and long, lifted her head and tail high in the air, and galloped away toward the wagons of the newcomers. All watched her in amazement. Sörine burst out crying, blaming herself for being so shortsighted as to forget all about her precious cow. . . . As he saw the beast gallop away, Per Hansa cursed it from the bottom of his heart.

"Rosie!—Rosie!"

In an instant, before the little company sitting there had ind time to gather their scattered wits, all the rest of eir cattle were smitten by the same craze. At the first low of Sörine's cow they had looked up inquiringly, had ught sight of the new arrivals, and at once had started off nind their leader—Rosie first, then Kjersti's Brindlesides—th rearing their tails on high and galloping straight to-rd the camp of the Indians.

. . "Damn the luck!" muttered Per Hansa between his th. "There goes the milk for our porridge! . . . The vil salt and burn their blasted tails!"

A far-away "moo-o-o" drifted in from the north, and re the Solum boys' Daisy came running at full speed, to n the deserters![1]

At that Per Hansa burst into a loud laugh. . . . "You'd ter go after your cow," he said to Sam, "unless you want to nch dry porridge all winter!"

The women took the matter each in her own way, according her feeling for her particular cow. Kjersti wept and took vowing that this was the worst thing that had ever hap-ed to her—it was just awful; Sörine's eyes were moist, she believed that her cow would come back, just the same; had never seen a better cow than Dolly and had tended like a mother. . . . But Beret remained quite calm; she med more annoyed than frightened. Why didn't one of men go after the cows? . . . When they remained sit-g and made no move, she rose and laid her spoon aside.

"We must get them at once," she announced, firmly. "If Indians were to leave to-night, the cows would follow—t is perfectly plain!" . . . She took And-Ongen in her ns and started for the hill.

"Good Heavens, Beret," cried Kjersti in despair. "You st be crazy!"

Per Hansa gazed fondly at his wife; across his face came ght that almost made him handsome. . . . There was a woman for you! . . . He got up before she had gone many steps, and ran to her side.

[1] The cattle of the first settlers, from the wandering habits they formed during the outward journey, had to be watched, for wanted to join every caravan that came along.

"Go back and eat, Beret-girl! There isn't anything to worry about, really and truly. . . . Leave the cows to me. It can just as well wait till after we have eaten. . . . We must behave like well-mannered folk, you know."

As they sat over the last of their porridge Per Hansa drew such ghastly pictures to Sam of the cruelty with which the Indians would probably treat the cows, that the women shuddered at his words. . . . "I've often heard—have read it in books, too—that Indians would rather take the scalp of a cow any day, than of a man. . . . Haven't you ever read about it? Huh! that's strange! . . . Well, they're just crazy, you see, for the scalp of a cow. They dry them out and use them for winter caps!" . . .

Beret looked at him reproachfully. It seemed to her that it ill behooved him to talk in this fashion; if they were all afraid, they couldn't help it; the words sounded coarse in his mouth, and seemed to coarsen him also. . . . "Can't you shut up with that talk!" she said in her quiet, cutting way, without looking up. "It isn't such a brave and manly thing, to terrorize poor womenfolk who are frightened already."

Per Hansa fell suddenly silent; his face grew burning red. In all the years that they had lived together it had never happened till now that she had shamed him before others. And she had spoken so quietly—hadn't even looked up! . . . He ate his porridge slowly and thoughtfully. What she had said kept repeating itself in his mind, and cut deeper each time.

At last he laid his spoon aside and got to his feet; he stuck his pipe in his mouth—the pipe that had been empty and cold so long now, for lack of fuel—and began sucking the stem.

"I suppose in all fairness, Sam, you ought to go chasing your own damned beast—you who are such a sharper in both the American and Indian languages!" he snapped out. . . . "But—oh, well, there might be some women over there who were worth having a look at!" he muttered with plain nuation. "I guess I'd better go myself and make it a ed job!"

Store-Hans jumped up like a flash and put his hand in father's. . . . Per Hansa glanced down into the beaming, dy face that smiled up at him and begged so earnestly.
. But the boy uttered never a word.

Come along, then," said the father. Still holding the stretched hand, he began to walk away.

Hans, come here!" his mother cried out, sharply. A d anxiety had come into her voice—a note of desperate ading.

No," said Per Hansa, shortly. "Hans is going with me."
. He waited for no answer, but grasped the boy's hand nly and started off.

IV

Store-Hans had been too absorbed in what was going on notice the clash between his parents. As they went along, whole being was athrill with excitement; he took long, nly strides, and chattered on in a low, rapid voice, but ays returned to the same question:

—What was his father going to do to the Indians?

—Do? . . . Per Hansa's mind refused to act any further.
e biting words of his wife, spoken in the plain hearing ll, kept ringing in his ears.

Yes, Dad, what are you going to do?"

We'll see about that later." . . . He tried to wrench self out of his abstraction, repeating in a loud tone:
e'll see later—when the time comes!"

Are you . . . are you going to fight them, Dad?"

er Hansa gave the boy's hand a good squeeze. "I guess ll have to be satisfied with a scalp or two!"

he only thing Store-Hans knew about scalping was that as the most dreadful thing in the world; as to the actual cess, he had only a hazy idea. Now he asked, fearfully, t did it mean, anyway—to scalp some one?

—Oh, nothing much. . . . Didn't he know how it wa done?

"No. . . . Please tell me, Dad?"

Per Hansa shifted the empty pipe to the other corner of hi mouth; he laughed as he said:

"You see, Store-Hans, when the hide begins to get goo and dry on the heads of some people, then the Indians pe it off."

"Does it grow out new again?" Store-Hans gave a side wise glance at the top of his father's head; before he realize it, his hand had gone up under his own cap.

"Oh, I suppose so."

"But . . . but doesn't it hurt awfully?"

"No, not at all . . . that is, when the skin is good an dry."

That seemed quite logical; Store-Hans grasped it im mediately.

"But what do they do with the scalp?"

"What do they do with the scalp?" Per Hansa spok slowly, as if his mind were elsewhere. . . . "They use it I guess . . . for mittens, and things like that. . . . The turn the hair side in, you see." . . .

"Oh, you're only fooling!" cried Store-Hans, lengthenin his stride in order not to fall behind.

"Maybe I am fooling. . . . I thought you knew all abou it, though."

The boy was dying to ask about other things; but he wa getting afraid to raise his voice now—his throat, too, seeme very dry. . . . And, besides, they were drawing so near t the Indian camp now, that his eyes kept him fully occupied

There was a good deal to see, up there on the hill. . . A big tent, or wigwam, had been pitched in the centre o the crescent, with four smaller ones on each side. A troo of brown, half-naked children were running around amon the tents. . . . They seemed to be playing games, though Store-Hans; and immediately he picked up courage. H saw women moving about, too. . . . There couldn't be an real danger here!

The rough tents, constructed of poles and hides, stood me distance back of the semicircle of oddly-assorted ve- les. Halfway between, a group of dusky squaws were sy at a fire, carrying wood from the wagons and throwing on; around the fire several bronzed men were sitting mo- nless, with their legs crossed under them. . . . These men re smoking—that was the first thing that caught Per nsa's eye. The flames of the camp fire threw a lurid re over the figures sitting around it, turning their copper- oured faces to a still deeper hue, their raven hair to a re intense and glistening black. They smoked on in ence.

When the two visitors had arrived within the illuminated cle, one of the Indians pointed to them with his pipe; a w words were spoken among them in a guttural tongue; rond this the coming of Per Hansa and his son created not ripple of excitement.

Per Hansa stepped forward and greeted them in English— had picked up enough words for that. The greeting was urned in the same language. . . . One of the braves put nething that sounded like a question; two of the others, ing beside him, added to it. . . . Per Hansa stood help- s for a moment; he could not understand a word.

But in this crisis Store-Hans, who had been half hiding ind his father, came to his aid; he whispered, rapidly: "They want to know if we live here."

"How the devil could you tell that? . . . By God! I ess we do!" Per Hansa nodded emphatically toward the lians. "Tell them there isn't any doubt of it—not the st doubt in the world—but say it nicely, now!"

Store-Hans stepped out in front, facing the seated red- ns; he tried his best to make them understand, using what e English he had learned during the past winter.

The visit was soon over; after that strange, impassive eting there seemed to be nothing else for Per Hansa to or do. The stray cows, all four of them, had finally lain wn beside the Indian wagons; he would only need to round them up and drive them home. . . . Yet there was something that made it almost impossible for him to tear himself away. The odour from the pipes wafted to him so enchantingly on the evening breeze, enthralled and held him captive. He hadn't had a decent smoke for over two weeks, and he could smell that this was good strong tobacco.

At last the temptation grew altogether too powerful; he simply couldn't resist it any longer. He glanced around the circle, picked out the face that looked to him the most approachable, then took the empty pipe from his mouth and indicated by signs that he needed something to fill it with.

The man he had chosen understood him perfectly. He gave a laugh, remarked something to the others, pulled a large leather pouch from his shirt, and held it out with a dignified gesture. Per Hansa grasped the pouch with an eager hand, took a deep dive into it, and gave his pipe a good fill. . . . "Many thanks, good friend! If Hans Olsa happens to get back before you're gone, I'll see that you are well repaid! . . . Hans, translate that to him the best way you know how. . . . What a thundering shame that we can't talk with such good folks!" . . . Per Hansa went over to the fire, raked out a glowing ember, lit his pipe, and pulled at it long and deeply, while an expression of rare contentment passed over his face.

V

Turning away from the fire, as he stood there enjoying his smoke, he noticed a face on the ground at his side—a face that peered out of the folds of a gaudily coloured blanket, so close to the fire that it startled him. . . . Good Lord! was the man trying to singe himself?

Per Hansa stared down into the face incredulously; the form in the blanket gazed up as fixedly at him in return. It struck him at once that the Indian must be suffering terrible pain; his features were distorted in agony.

"Store-Hans!" he called, hastily. "Come here and ask s fellow what's the matter with him. It looks to me as he were fighting death itself!"

Again Store-Hans had to try out his meagre stock of newmer English on the Indians. The face moaned; in a monent it gave answer. The boy repeated his question; a ond answer came, and then another long moan.

'He says his hand is hurt," Store-Hans reported.

'Is that it? Too bad! . . . Tell him I'd like to take a look that hand of his."

But Store-Hans didn't have to repeat the request. The n had been lying there watching them as they spoke toher, looking closely and intently at Per Hansa. Now he up beside him without a word; first he removed the nket from his arm, and then unwound a bundle of dirty oured rags that were wrapped around his hand.

When this was done, he held out an ugly-looking claw, llen to the size of a log; not only the hand, but the st and a large part of the arm as well were badly swollen l infected. The evil seemed to have its source in a festerwound in the palm of the hand. . . . Per Hansa exined the hand, felt of it, squeezed it, and turned it over, if he had done nothing else all the days of his life but d to such cases. The flesh was as hard to the touch as a ck of wood; but the wound itself didn't look serious.

"Sure enough!" he observed, wisely. "If this doesn't end with blood poisoning my name isn't Per! Maybe it's come that already. . . . Tell him"—he turned to Store-Hans—ll him we've got to have some warm water at once—and re rags. But they must be clean—clean white rags, tell n! . . . See what a good job of talking you can do, now!" th these words, he went back to his examination.

The job of talking, however, was more than Store-Hans ld handle—he stuck in it halfway. That his father nted warm water he could make them understand; but the er request for clean white rags was either beyond his glish or a little too much for their comprehension.

The sick Indian had kept his eyes intently fixed on the n who was examining his hand with all the assurance of an expert. Others had now risen and come up to them one by one. A close circle had formed about the little group. The women were also joining it; the children stopped playing and slipped in among their elders; at last the whole camp had gathered in a silent ring around the three. . . . Per Hansa's face wore a sober expression, but all the while he kept drawing long, deep puffs from his pipe.

"Seventeen devils of a claw you've got, man!" he exclaimed at last, when he had finished his diagnosis. . . . "I can't see any way out of it, Store-Hans. You'll have to run home and get mother. Tell her an old chief is lying over here almost ready to die—tell her it's blood poisoning. She must bring the small kettle, and all the clean rags she can spare. Can you remember to say white rags? . . . And she must bring a pinch of salt, too. . . . The man has got to have help this very night, tell her. . . . Now run along. You aren't afraid, are you?"

Certainly Store-Hans wasn't frightened any longer; this was the greatest experience he had ever had or ever expected to have. . . . He had already pressed his way through the throng when his father thought of something which he had forgotten, and called him back.

. . . "Tell Sörrina to go home and see if there isn't a drop left in Hans Olsa's bottle. Even if it isn't more than a thimbleful, we ought to have it; it's a matter of life or death here. . . . And mother must bring some pepper. . . . Let's see, now, how well you can remember everything!"

The boy was off like a flash. As soon as he had gone Per Hansa began treating the hand. First of all, he made them understand that he needed water to wash his own hands . . . "Yes, water, water!" he said, going through the motion of dipping his hands and rubbing them. They caught his meaning at once; the word was passed among them, and a woman immediately brought some water in a tin bucket.

Per Hansa washed his hands very carefully; then he poured out the water and motioned for more. . . . "Yes, yes—more, more!" . . . He got it at once and began to wash the wound—first the hand, and then the wrist and the m, but particularly the hand, and the wound itself most of . . . . Brown it had been in the beginning, that skin— d brown it remained; Per Hansa couldn't be certain nether he had got it clean. But now he led the man as se to the fire as the heat would allow; there he sat down th him, and began to draw on the great store of experience had gathered as a fisherman on the Lofoten seas. First massaged the flesh around the wound for a long time; en he moved upward to the wrist, and afterward to the m. He rubbed with the palm of his hand, making circular otions, gently for a while, then stronger and firmer; from ne to time he bent over the hand, breathed heavily on the ound, and continued the rubbing.

At last Store-Hans returned, bringing his mother, who rried all the articles his father had sent for. Per Hansa ticed that she had put on her Sunday clothes; for some ason, this pleased him. When she stepped within the rcle of the camp fire, she paused, greeted the strangers ietly, and dropped a curtsy.

"What do you think you are doing here?" she asked in a v voice; the words seemed to carry more of reproach than ar. . . . He suddenly remembered the incident at supper hile ago; the wave of bitterness rose again in his heart. . What a silly question for a grown woman to ask!

When she received no answer, she continued:

"Kjersti is crying her eyes out—and the rest aren't much tter off. . . . These people have got to look after themves! You must come home at once!"

Per Hansa still remained silent. . . . This speech was so like the Beret that he knew, that he glanced up at her ickly.

"Give me that kettle! . . . Yes—water, water!" he shouted them, pointing to the kettle. But then he remembered ore-Hans. . . . "Tell them that I want clean water—yes, an, that's it! And it must be hot, too!"

Now he found time to turn to his wife. . . . "Oh, well, ersti isn't going to miscarry to-night! . . . But if you n't want to stay here, to help save a human life in dire distress, you'd better go home. . . . Here, give me the rest of the things!" Her words of an hour before were again ringing loud in his ears; his own voice had taken on an added harshness; he knew it and felt glad.

Beret said no more; she stood looking silently at him, flushed and confused.

The kettle had now been placed on the fire.

"Where is the salt? . . . We need salt in the water."

He took the antique whisky bottle that Sörine had sent; it was still a good half full. The pepper, done up in a little package, had been brought over in a cup. Per Hansa looked at it for a moment in grave doubt. . . . "No, it's too much—never in the world can he stand all that! . . . Hold out your apron, Beret, to catch this. . . . There's too much pepper."

"Now, don't be so hasty!" she said. She took the pepper from him, made a funnel of the bag, and held it out for him to pour in as much as he wanted.

Then Per Hansa concocted for the sick Indian that "horse cure" which is famous among all the inhabitants of Nordland. A goodly tablespoonful of pepper lay in the cup; he filled it up with whisky, stirred it around, put the bottle down on the ground, and motioned to the Indian to drink.

The man took the cup, sniffed at it, and smiled; then he put it to his mouth and took a draught, smacking his lips and making a fearful grimace.

"Tell him to drain it off at once, Store-Hans! . . . He'll live through it—though it does kick powerfully to begin with!"

The Indian downed the rest of the mixture without wincing.

As Per Hansa was pouring the whisky from the bottle a couple of the others had suddenly grown restless; as soon as he set it down, one of these rose to his feet with a jerk and sauntered in their direction; the other followed close at his heels.

"They're taking the bottle!" whispered Beret, frightened at their manner.

Per Hansa whirled like a flash and caught hold of a own arm; he grasped it firmly and gave it a violent twist. howl of pain echoed through the camp. . . . "What the ll are you doing!" cried Per Hansa, wrenching loose the ttle with his other hand. "That bottle belongs to Hans sa. Don't you dare to touch it!" He looked so fiercely the pair that they slunk off, afraid.

"Now come here and help me, woman! . . . Hold this ttle, and let the liquor drip down on his hand while I rub in. . . . Right on the wound—only a drop at a time . . . d! did you ever see a nastier-looking hand?"

Beret did as he told her, but her own hand was shaking lently. He looked at her closely. Her face was flushed; rs hung in her eyes. . . . And all at once the loud ring- of bitter words died away in his ears.

He massaged the hand of the Indian for a long while, uring the whisky on freely. Then he asked for the rags ich she had brought. These he dipped in the kettle, ere the water was now boiling; he wrung them out ghtly and began swathing them around the hand—one over the other. The man gasped and moaned in his eat agony.

"Now, Beret, we ought to have a clean, dry cloth to wrap und the whole business. . . . But probably you didn't ng anything like that?"

She hesitated for an instant, then untied her apron and nded it over to him. He knew that it was her very best on. He could not bear to take it, but he did not say so.

"That's just it, Beret-girl—the very thing! If that doesn't p him, I don't know anything in the wide world that would re his hand! . . . Now, take mother with you and go me, Store-Hans. You can see for yourselves, there's thing to be afraid of here. I'll bring the cows back with when I come."

"But when will you come?" she asked with a tremor in voice.

"Oh, I shall have to stay here part of the night, at least we can't make the swelling go down, and that right quick, there's nothing under God's heaven that can save him! I'll have to change the rags every half hour. . . . But you go right along, now, and don't worry!"

Beret paused a moment; she gazed at him, saying not a word, but her mouth quivered. Then she took Store-Hans by the hand and walked away.

VI

During the first part of the night Per Hansa kept constant vigil over the sick man, frequently looking at his watch and changing the bandages; every time the hand was exposed, he rubbed in a few more drops from Hans Olsa's bottle. It was evident from the man's face that the pain was growing no worse; he even slept at intervals.

Midnight passed. The whole camp was now asleep; the men lay around like mummies, wrapped in their gaudy blankets, their feet towards the fire. Occasionally one of them would rise and throw on more wood; Per Hansa noticed that it was always the same man. . . . The night was vast and still; the glow of the fire spread a strange light a little way around . . . beyond hovered impenetrable darkness.

Per Hansa felt tired and drowsy; he realized that he would have to pull himself together in order to keep going through the middle watch. . . . Suddenly he pricked up his ears; in an instant he was wide awake. He had heard a sound like steps in the grass, off on one side—steps that seemed to be hesitating as if in fear. They trod cautiously, drawing closer and closer; then they stopped, as if the person were listening. . . . He glanced around; the sick man slept at his side; all the others seemed to be sleeping. Who could it be, reconnoitring so quietly out there? . . . He got up abruptly, stepped closer to the fire, and stood fully revealed against the glare. Now the steps were heard again, firmly approaching. . . . The next moment Beret stood within the circle of the camp fire, silently looking at him.

Per Hansa's eyes leaped out and embraced his wife's form; a great glow of love and tenderness surged through him. . . .

eret-girl, come here!" he called in a low voice. "Don't frightened; the whole crew is asleep!"

She advanced slowly to the side of the fire where he stood; she did not look at him. Her face was flushed and swol- with weeping. . . . "How she must have been crying!" thought; and the memory of his harsh words filled him h deep remorse. He went up to her timidly, took her by hand, and led her nearer the fire . . . "Beret, you ought be sleeping at this hour of the night! . . . Have you been ghtened again?"

Her body shook with sobs; they tore her so convulsively t she could not speak a word. Like a crushed thing she k inertly to the ground. He threw himself down beside , put one arm around her waist, and sought her hand. . . . en she began to weep softly; he heard it, and stroked the nd he had found. After a while he had tried to say, ntly: "I guess the old fellow is going to pull through, all ht." . . . But the moment the words were out of his uth he felt that he hadn't said the right thing; in his con- ion, he asked her how all the others were at home.

She made no response to either of his attempts; then he rd the sick Indian stir, and looked around at him. The n lay wide awake, staring at them fixedly with his black, dy eyes.

For a while Per Hansa busied himself once more with the ured hand; the man sat up as the treatment went on; ret rose and stood close by, watching the operation.

"If you had a string to tie around the rags, so that they uldn't loosen when they got dry, they would keep the heat ger," she said in a low voice, but calm and clear.

"Oh yes! . . . If I only had it!"

She turned away for a moment and began fumbling at her thes; then, with a bashful but determined air, she handed n one of her home-braided garters. . . . "Will this do?" asked.

"Do? . . . My God! Beret, that's exactly what we need!" . He bound up the sick hand tightly, and tied the garter und the bandage. . . . "The fellow's better already!" he cried. "I can see it in his eyes—and his hand feels softer. . . . But it's still bad enough; he isn't over it yet, by any means!"

When the bandage had been firmly fastened the Indian got up, went to one of the wagons, and fetched three heavy blankets; these he gave to Per Hansa, motioning that they should cover themselves and lie down.

"Now, doesn't that show, Beret, what decent people they are? . . . I think the fellow will be able to take care of himself for a while. We might as well turn in!" . . . He wrapped one blanket around her, another around himself; then they both lay down with their feet to the fire, and pulled the third blanket over the two of them. Per Hansa put his arm around his wife and held her close in a fond, protecting embrace. "Now try to sleep, my dear Beret-girl!" he whispered, reassuringly . . . She dropped off almost at once, and slept until the crimson dawn fell on the eastern prairie.

The Indians remained for another day and night. During their stay Per Hansa spent more time with them than he did at home. Store-Hans practically lived on the hill, keeping an eye on things. And Ole, too, strolled over to the Indian camp at odd times. . . . But Sam Solum let the savages severely alone; and the women, though they were curious to see the camp, felt too timid to venture near.

The Indians, for their part, kept strictly to themselves. They did not once approach the houses of the settlement; neither, strange to say, did they allow their women to come over.

It was noon of the third day before they broke camp, to continue the journey northward. The hand of the sick man still looked very bad, but the immediate danger seemed to be over. Per Hansa had made a sling for him, in which he carried his arm. When the long train of queer-looking teams had got well under way, they saw the sick Indian coming down the hill toward the house, leading a fully saddled pony by the bridle; one of the wagons stood waiting for him farther along the hill.

The fellow is probably coming to say good-bye, thought er Hansa; he got up and went to meet him. Beret and the ildren followed slowly a little way behind. The man alked straight up to Per Hansa and uttered a few uninlligible words; he laid in Per Hansa's hand the bridle by nich he was leading the pony; then he said a few more ords, made a short, stiff bow, turned on his heel and alked away. . . . He was a tall, broad-shouldered savage, ell built and handsome.

"Has the old boy gone stark crazy?" exclaimed Per Hansa.
Can you imagine what he means?"

"He wants to give you the pony!" shouted Store-Hans,
s eyes round with wonder.

Per Hansa roared out an emphatic protest, and started ter the stranger. . . . "No, no!" he cried. "That will ver do!" . . .

But the Indian only strode to the waiting wagon, climbed
, and rode away.

"I've never seen the beat of it in all my born days!" said
r Hansa, solemnly. He stood as if dumfounded, lding the bridle over his arm. . . . "Saddle and erything!" . . .

Store-Hans gave a leap into the air, turned a somersault, nich immediately had to be repeated. Never in his life
d he felt so supremely happy. . . . Then he and his other ran over to claim the prize.

VII

In the evening of the following day the loaded wagons rived from town; they brought great stores of curiosities, d the men who drove them had many remarkable tales tell.

Hans Olsa, who had carried fifteen dollars in cash from r Hansa to buy merchandise with besides going surety r him for a plow and a horse rake, came first to their use to unload, before going home. There was a great ountain of bags and packages, sacks and boxes; but best of all were the plow and the rake. The latter, especially,—it was painted in such beautiful, rich colours, red, blue, and green; it looked so impressive standing there in the yard, with its seat reared high in the air . . . like a veritable throne! Nothing would do but Store-Hans must climb up and try it at once; he was wondering if they couldn't hitch their new pony to this wonderful rig! . . . Still more marvellous things than this had come from town; but Store-Hans was fully occupied for a while and did not see them till later. Over at Tönseten's stood a mowing machine, which could cut both hay and wheat; this also had a seat high up in the air; and at the Solum boys' the sights were equally remarkable.

There was a grand celebration at Hans Olsa's house that night. Tönseten and Per Hansa arrived long before the others to have a talk together. They found much to do, and many important matters to discuss and settle. Everything that had been borrowed during the past season must now be paid back, and that was a complicated affair; for at one time one kind of measure had been used, at another time another; they were all in the same boat. Everyone owed everyone else—and now it was time to square the accounts. Hans Olsa, who during the shortage had had the most to lend, was now left with enough supplies to stock a good-sized store.

But the goods were what interested Per Hansa least of all just now; he was eaten up with curiosity, and only wanted to ask questions; he had to hear every detail of their difficulties and adventures on the way. . . . Had they run across many people? What news had they picked up? Did there seem to be many settlers moving west? How did the prospects look where they had been? . . . Was he a fair- minded man, this fellow they had bargained with—the one who had trusted them for the plow and the rake? Did he look like a chap who would extend still further credit to a poor devil who had an honest face and came to him in a straightforward way? . . . God knows, Per Hansa needed such a blessed lot of things!

—Yes, Hans Olsa would say that the man seemed to be rretty decent sort of fellow; he spoke only English, howr, so one couldn't get far with him in the way of talk; s was a bad piece of news for Per Hansa. His goods re fairly expensive, too; but one couldn't expect anything ter out here. . . . On second thought, Hans Olsa serily doubted whether it would be possible to get further dit from him. At the start of their dickering, the man uldn't listen to a word of extending credit; but Syvert argued with him so long and sensibly that he had finally ded, on condition that they both sign their names as urity for the plow and the rake. . . . By this time, anyw, he knew they were going to buy so much from him t it wouldn't have paid him to be unreasonable.

The returned voyagers, however, thought that the folks nome had stranger tales than their own to tell. It seemed hing short of a miracle that Per Hansa had been able bring back to life an Indian chief with one foot in the ve—those were the very words Kjersti had used to her band. Tönseten swore that he had never heard anything strange; by George! it was more exciting than any storyk ever written!

. . "I declare, Per Hansa," said Hans Olsa, looking at in open admiration, "it's a queer thing about you! No ter how hard you're put to it, you always give a good ount of yourself! . . . I was dead set on having you go ng with us this trip; we could have arranged it somehow, know. Syvert and I were speaking about it only the ht before we left; but then we both decided that we could so much more comfortable about going away, knowing t you were here. . . . It was an act of Providence, I to leave you home this time!" . . . Tönseten nodded -and-amen to all that Hans Olsa had said.

Per Hansa accepted their homage very modestly; he drew eep breath and started to reply; but words failed him, he had to begin all over again.

. . "Oh, well—so much for that, boys. Forget it, now! idn't do anything out of the ordinary. But I might as well own up that when I told Ole to get Old Maria I didn't have any courage to spare! . . . There came the band of Indians, thirty strong or more—and here I stood, alone with three crazy women! . . . It looked like far from plain sailing, I can tell you!" . . .

"I don't doubt it a bit!" agreed Hans Olsa. "It's a wonder to me that you didn't take the women and try to run away!"

"Yes, but where could I run to? Besides, they had horses . . . The women were crying and carrying on, you know . . . And just then it crossed my mind, Hans Olsa, that if you were only near enough to sing out to—and you, too, Syvert—I'd gladly have given my right hand, or both of them!"

"Sam wasn't much use to you, eh?" asked Tönseten.

"No, Syvert, Sam isn't quite equal to such a job." But then Per Hansa felt that he had been too harsh; he quickly added: "Let's hope that he, too, will have guts some day. . . . The boy has plenty of good qualities. . . . "

Meanwhile Beret and Kjersti had arrived; the Solum boys turned up at last, and then they were all gathered. The women had gone with Sörine into her new house; they were curious to see what her husband had brought; she had to give both of them a taste from this bag and that. The menfolk remained sitting behind the barn; they had many weighty matters to discuss, and didn't want to be interrupted; just now the hay cutting seemed to be the all-absorbing topic. . . . Per Hansa's boys and Hans Olsa's girl were chasing one another around the sod hut, playing "Indian."

It was a strange thing, however, the number of trips the men had to make into the barn to look at the window and door which Hans Olsa had brought. There must indeed be something very odd about that window and that door. The men never seemed to be done looking at them; they went in and came out—came out only to go in again; each time they reappeared they were laughing and talking more glibly. The children sneaked close to the walls whenever the men re inside. . . . It must be some very secret business they re about! Their voices sank so low—most of the time thing but whispering could be heard. . . . And such a lley of hawking and coughing and clearing of throats ne from the interior of the barn, such a smacking of lips, h a steady gurgling—like water running out of a bottle—t the children pressed against the wall outside couldn't p laughing. . . . There, one of them had given a tre-ndous sneeze! . . . "Hush!" whispered Sofie. "That s Syvert—he must have swallowed wrong!"

. . Something very strange, indeed, whatever it was. . Now they heard Tönseten swear that it was his turn. had forgotten himself and spoken out loud: "Can't I at Per Hansa to an honest drink, when he has saved both wife and my cow from dire death and scalping! . . . ss it off, Per, old boy, and let the rest of us get a nce!"

Then more jolly laughter and smacking of lips.

"What do you suppose they're doing?" whispered Sofie, king a wry face.

"Drinking, of course!" said Ole, curtly, furious because was not allowed to be in on this. . . . Surely he was wn-up enough to take a drink or two! He could drive oxen fully as well as his father.

Then Sörine appeared in the doorway, shouting to them t now they must all come in. In one of the boxes which husband had brought she had found two bottles. As far she could make out, it was neither kerosene nor liniment; felt pretty sure that it wasn't syrup! . . . It would do harm to find out exactly what the stuff was—to-night they l good reason for rejoicing. She brought a glass, treated h of the neighbour women, took a wee drop herself, l then called in the men.

All five of the menfolk entered in a body and drew up in lose group at the door; at sight of the whisky they had ddenly become bashful and cautious.

"You shouldn't be handing around costly Christmas treats the middle of the haying season!" said Tönseten, craftily.

. . . "What sort of a housekeeper is this that you've got Hans Olsa?"

"Oh, come on, Syvert!" laughed Sörine.

—What, he? Good gracious! no—he wouldn't have anything! He couldn't stand liquor right after supper, anyway . . . She ought not to lead a weak brother into temptation

But he was chuckling, and his four companions were chuckling with him.

Per Hansa pushed Hans Olsa forward.

"Here, Hans Olsa, you are the boss of this house. Show us how the thing ought to be done. . . . Syvert, you see, isn't feeling well, poor devil!"

—Now, it would never do for him to be first—this was Hans Olsa's ruling. Where he had been brought up, that wasn't considered proper.

"If you don't come at once and take this glass," said Sörine with mock severity, "I'll pour it back into the bottle. . . . Then you can stand there wishing for it as much as you please!"

. . . "Hold on, there, Sörrina—not so hasty, not so hasty! Be careful with the blessings of the Lord! . . . Of course I'll sample it for you, if you've got to have it done!" . . . It was Tönseten, after all, who had first spoken and come forward. But it seemed to take him an awful while to swallow that dram; he hawked and grinned over every little sip, and said the liquor burnt his throat so unmercifully that he could hardly get it down. . . . "Tell me, Hans Olsa, where did you find this stuff?"

"Now, heave it in, Syvert, so that the rest of us can have a whack before it gets too cold!" laughed Hans Olsa. "You've got to help me with that window, you know, before you leave to-night."

"Right you are! . . . Yes, right you are!" agreed Tönseten, solemnly, and emptied the glass without more ado.

Sörine treated them all. . . . And now the menfolk were sorry, but they really had no time to stay indoors; Hans Olsa needed all their help to get that window in before it came k; and out they trooped in a body again, as soon as they emptied their glasses.

When the celebration was over and they finally set out for ne that night, it seemed to Kjersti that Syvert walked very erly. No matter how she adjusted her own steps, he uld either range ahead of her or lag behind; when the er took place, he would suddenly discover it and lurch ward, struggling hard to keep his balance; once he had ght up with her again, he would come to a stop and stand e babbling.

"What in the name of common sense are you mumbling ut? What ails you, Syvert dear? . . . You act as if were walking and talking in your sleep on the open irie!"

"Hic! . . . Don't know!" he sighed. . . . "Feel awright . Maybe li'l' queer. . . . Sort o' diz' . . . sort o' dizzy, now. . . . Feet don't work prop'ly!" He lurched ahead a boat scudding down the slope of a wave. . . . "You w, I think . . . abs'lutely I do . . . must be that stuff . that damned stuff of Sörrina's!"

"Oh, well," said Kjersti, consolingly, laughing to herself, it isn't anything worse than that, you'll soon be all right in."

VIII

t was two days later that the great misfortune befell m. And according to the manner of such events, it came le everything seemed safe and serene and even the ught of ill luck was far away.

They had finished their afternoon lunch. Hans Olsa was ting hay; his new machine hummed lustily over the prai- shearing the grass so evenly and so close to the ground his heart leaped with joy to behold the sight. . . . What ifference, this, from pounding away with an old scythe, steep, stony hillsides! . . . All the men had gathered und to see him start; Per Hansa had returned home from send-off firmly determined to get another cow for the winter, even if he had to steal one; for with such a machine it would be nothing to cut the hay.

Per Hansa was finishing his thatching that afternoon. Ole and Store-Hans were helping; even Beret came out from time to time to lend a hand. The father was chatting with the boys, who answered him gayly; now and then they became so boisterous and laughed so heartily together that little And-Ongen wanted to get up on the roof with them. Some distance away the pony was tethered; the boys petted him constantly, and already he seemed so tame that in a short while it would be safe to turn him loose.

Tönseten was breaking some new land, with Sam as helper; from his high lookout, Per Hansa had just noticed how well Syvert was getting along with his field. But wait a bit, my good Syvert, wait a bit! . . . Per Hansa simply didn't feel like hurrying to-day. He shouted down once more to Beret, asking her to see whether the roof would hold water; that was one of his little jokes. The point was this: it had sounded so pleasant to hear her voice in the room below while he had been working on the roof; but now that the thatch was on, the low tone in which she naturally spoke didn't carry through the thickness of the sod; he missed hearing her, and liked to make her shout now and then. . . . He seemed to notice that she was growing better satisfied with things as they were out here.

Henry Solum was digging a well down by the creek. Everyone was busy with his own particular task; the little frontier settlement hummed with the keen joy of labour.

. . . Then the blow fell upon them—suddenly!

Kjersti noticed it first. At lunch time she had brought out a bite to eat and a drop of coffee for the men. Plenty reigned just now, after the trip to town. As she was about to enter her own house again it occurred to her that she hadn't seen Brindlesides, either on the way over or on the way back. . . . The cow must have been in sight, somewhere around. She turned and walked a little way beyond the corner of the house, then stopped and surveyed the scene. . . . Kjersti kept on looking until her eyes watered—until : could hear the heavy pounding of her heart; but her v was not to be seen on the whole wide prairie . . . and a single one of the other critters, either!

In her wild excitement she ran straight to Sörine's and hed into the house, crying:
"Have you any idea where your cow is?"
"My cow . . .?" Sörine noticed her agitated face, and ıld not say another word.
"That's just what I said, Sörrina! . . . Where is she—ere is she? . . . Oh, merciful Heaven!" . . .
"You are scaring the life out of me, Kjersti! The cow st be right around here." . . . But she didn't wait for an swer; the women rushed out of the house together.
. . Sure enough, no cows in sight anywhere!
"I can't understand it!" exclaimed Sörine. . . . "Can ı?"
"They've run away!" cried Kjersti in despair.
"Of course they couldn't have sunk through the earth!"
rine was always a sensible woman in a crisis.
"Oh, where are they?" wailed Kjersti. "Where have they ıe?"
"We must tell the men this minute!" declared Sörine, nly. She saw that it was no use to waste time in waiting her neighbour; leaving Kjersti to look after herself, she tened over to where her husband was working.
Hans Olsa pulled up the horses abruptly when he saw the o women straggling across the field.
. . The cows? Oh, nothing worse than that! . . .
ell, he hadn't seen hide nor hair of the cows; but they st be around somewhere. . . . He was in such high spir-because of the smooth way the new machine was running, l of the ease with which they would now be able to get the hay they needed, that he felt as if nothing could worry n to-day. . . . It was a sin how nervous these women re. Good Lord! the cows would show up all right at king time!
"We must begin to search for them at once!" . . . Sörine
s so earnest and determined about it, that almost unconsciously he found himself looking around. . . . Strange, not a beast to be seen! . . . Then he, too, became serious; he unhitched the horses, tied one of them to the mowing machine, mounted the other, and rode up the hill.

"We must go and tell Per Hansa!" said Sörine, briskly.

"Oh, what's the use!" wailed Kjersti, wringing her hands. "You can see for yourself that they are gone! . . . Yes, gone—and if anyone is to find them, we'll have to do it!"

Sörine was now both angry and frightened—angry with Kjersti, frightened over the cows. She hurried on ahead, the other trailing after.

But there was no information to be had at Per Hansa's, either. None of them there had thought of keeping an eye on the cows; the animals had gone around loose every day, and had invariably come home at milking time in the evening; they never had been in the habit of straying so far away that they couldn't be seen. . . . Ole could distinctly remember having noticed them over by the creek, that very forenoon.

Per Hansa took the matter calmly and made a comforting suggestion; the cows were probably lying down in the tall grass, somewhere along the creek; they'd turn up safe and sound when it came milking time. . . . But just then Hans Olsa rode up with a very sober face and related that he hadn't seen a sign of life stirring on the whole prairie!

When Hans Olsa took it that way, and spoke so seriously, Per Hansa, too, began to get worried; he and the boys at once came down from the roof.

"Take the pony, Ola, and ride down to the creek. Search upstream first, then turn and go south. If you don't see anything, you'd better notify the Solum boys and Tönseten." . . . Per Hansa still believed that the cows would come back all right of their own accord; but he proposed that they all should quit work fairly early; then if the cows hadn't shown up they could get together and decide what was best to be done. For surely the gnomes hadn't taken them underground! . . .

IX

The evening wore on; outside of every hut the settlers ood watching, but no cows appeared. The uneasiness epened, and that sneaking dread which comes to all when e about them has suddenly and mysteriously disappeared. . The wind blew from the southwest, driving heavy rain uds; they hung so low that the grass seemed to bend as ey swept over it where the plain swelled up to meet the y.

A depressing gloom hovered over each of the four families ting around the supper table. At Per Hansa's, little Andngen wept bitterly and inconsolably because she hadn't en taken along to pet Rosie while her mother milked. As ey were sitting down to supper, the child had asked if ey weren't going to milk the cow to-night; Beret didn't ve the heart to tell her what had happened, and said stily that she had milked already. The child felt that great injustice had been done her—that she had been deuded of something which was hers by right. She had rst out crying and had wanted to go to Rosie at once; t the mother had said: No, Rosie had gone away as on as she had given her milk, and would not come back to-morrow. And-Ongen had hung tearfully around her ther's neck, trying to make her promise never to go milkg again unless she took her along. The mother had comted her as best she could; although she had not said ch, it had been more affecting to look at her than at e child.

Store-Hans listened to them until, all at once, he had to his spoon aside. He couldn't have swallowed another uthful of his porridge. He got up quietly, his eyes on the or, slipped outside, and ran behind the house. . . . The y thought of eating was horrible; every spoonful had eatened to choke him. It had seemed as if he were dipg the spoon in Rosie's very blood. . . . And dear Rosie, und whose neck he had put his arms so many times, resting his cheek against her soft skin. . . . He felt now that he loved her almost more than any living being in the world!

The elder brother, who considered himself a full-grown man, had remained at the table, gulping down large mouthfuls of milk and porridge with an indifferent air. He noticed his brother go out; then he said in a loud voice, just let the cows wait till he got hold of them! He'd lash their hides so thoroughly that they wouldn't ever dare to play that trick again! . . . His father shot a glance at the boy, which silenced him immediately. The next moment he, too, had lost his appetite and laid his spoon aside. After a while he went out; though he could hear where his brother was, by certain unmistakable sounds, he did not try to find him; instead he climbed up on the roof and sat down there alone.

A little later the whole colony gathered on top of the Indian hill near Per Hansa's. Per Hansa himself, with Beret and the child, came last of all, although they had the shortest distance to walk. Away behind them Ole sauntered along; but Store-Hans was nowhere to be seen. The evening lay heavily on the plain. Toward the south, where the clouds were massing together, it was already deepening into night. No life, no sound—only the wind moaning under a lowering sky. . . . The evening brought memories to them—memories of half-forgotten tales which people had heard and repeated long, long ago, about happenings away off in a far country. There it had been known to have actually taken place, that both man and beast would be spirited away by trolls. . . . So many strange things were hovering between heaven and earth, if one stopped to think . . . and remember! . . . But that anything of the sort could happen out here on the open prairie, where not so much as a single jutting cliff or wooded ridge appeared, that was the strangest of all!

The folk stood around in gloomy silence; each was thinking the same thoughts.

. . . "They must be down by the creek!" repeated Tönseten for the hundredth time.

The hopelessness in his voice struck the same chord of solation that possessed them all; no one had courage to Tönseten what he supposed could have happened to the ws down there. When he got no answer, he added with even deeper note of melancholy:

. . . "Talk about mystery!"

The wind swept over them with a chilly breath, now and n flicking a drop of rain from the dense clouds. Sam lum rose from where he had been sitting on the ground, d began to walk up and down as if he had made up his nd.

"In my opinion," he announced, firmly, "it's the doings of red man! . . . He's at his work again!"

All turned to look at him.

"You saw how crazy mad the cows acted that night when Indians came? Well, most likely they noticed it, too, d have come back here after them. That's where we'll ve to look for our cows, my friends!" . . . Sam spoke in old, convincing voice; now he had solved the riddle for m and felt very superior.

His idea at once gained general acceptance; it was at least natural explanation. To the women it sounded very rea-nable; they wondered why they hadn't thought of it them-ves; for they had all seen how crazy the cattle acted that ght. . . . Hans Olsa and Tönseten pondered deeply over problem for a while; they said nothing at first; this ex-nation had at least dispersed the feeling of weirdness that d gripped the colony; but the longer they thought, the re they realized that scant consolation lay in the theory t the Indians had enticed the cattle away; for where could y find the Indians, or how could they recover the cattle cer they had been found? If they had stolen them, they ant to keep them—and keep them they could.

Tönseten marched straight up to Per Hansa; he spoke idly, in a voice of great determination:

"If that's the case, by God! you've got to go and get the ws the first thing in the morning—you who are so friendly
h the Indians. . . . We must have our cows right away!"

"Yes, good Heavens!" Kjersti put it. "How can we get along if that drop of milk is taken away from us? . . . You ought to go this very minute!"

Per Hansa sat gazing steadily off into the distance; but he said never a word. At Kjersti's remark, however, it seemed as if something had suddenly stung him; he bounded up from the ground like a rubber ball.

"That's just the job for you and Sam! . . . Come on, wife, let's go home and get to bed."

With these words he stalked away; everyone could see that now Per Hansa was thoroughly angry.

X

Rest was a long time in coming to them at Per Hansa's that night; a strange uneasiness had entered there and would not leave the house.

Store-Hans had not accompanied them to the hill; his brother found him sitting outside when he came home, and told him what Sam had said; he added it as his own opinion that undoubtedly the Indians had been there and stolen all the cows! . . . Ole had then left his brother and gone in to bed; the father and mother were inside already, getting ready for the night; but time went on and the other boy did not come. . . . After a while the mother had gone out to look for him; she had called several times and had walked around the house; finally she had received a gruff answer from the gable of the roof. There sat the boy, staring out into the darkness. He refused to come down until she spoke to him harshly, saying that she would call his father if he did not mind her at once. . . . Then he slid down quickly and silently, ran into the house, slipped off his clothes, and flung himself into bed.

Quiet gradually settled on the room; the father and mother had at last retired. As they were on the point of falling to sleep, a violent sob came from the boys' bed; silence immediately followed—breathless silence; then came another sob, more violent than the first—a strangled gasp of anguish . . . The mother called across the room, asking what was ne matter—was Store-Hans sick? At that he broke down earnest, with long heaves and gasps, with sobs so violent nat they threatened to choke him. Beret spoke to him ently and soothingly; little by little the storm over there in ne dark abated, lulled away, and finally seemed to die out together . . . except for a flutter or two. . . . Suddenly ere arose a hoarse sound like that of bellows inhaling the r, which ended in a tear-choked gasp: "Rosie! . . .

o-o-sie!"

"Stay where you are, Beret," said Per Hansa. "I'll get and tend to the little fellow!" He pulled on his trousers, nd went over in the dark to the boys' bed; his voice was so w that it could hardly be heard.

. . . "Come, Hansy-boy, I'll tell you a secret!"

He put his arm around the youngster, lifted him out of ed, took a coat from the wall and wrapped it around him, en carried him outside. Over by the woodpile, which they ad hauled home together from the Sioux River, he sat own with the boy in his lap. . . . They began to talk. At st only the father did the speaking; but after a while, be-veen sobs, Store-Hans began to join in. The wind, driving arm raindrops full in their faces, seemed to ask if they had one crazy, sitting out here at this hour of the night; but ey paid not the slightest attention. . . .

Store-Hans was finding consolation in his father's wise nd kindly chat.

. . . "It's a burning shame," Per Hansa was saying, "that e haven't got two ponies! Then you could go with me
-morrow when I ride out to fetch those pesky cows!"

—Oh! . . . Did he know where they were, then?—slipped t between two sobs.

"Of course I do!"

Store-Hans snuggled deeper into his father's lap at this surance, feeling an infinite, blissful safety there.

—Was it the Indians who had taken them?

"Certainly not! Those were honest Indians. . . . You uld see that for yourself."

—But where were the cows, then?

"Oh, they've just strayed off so far that they can't find their way home again. . . . But don't worry, boy. To-morrow morning I'm going to ride out and get them, never fear!"

A long silence followed this promise; Store-Hans felt a blissful happiness settling upon him; the sobs gradually ceased.

"The Indians don't scalp cows, do they?"

"No, indeed! . . . They aren't such barbarians!"

"They are good people, aren't they, Dad?"

"Yes, just ordinary folks."

"Cows wouldn't be anything for Indian braves to fight for, would they?"

"I should say not! . . . And much less for chiefs!"

It was growing very late; the raindrops were still falling steadily; the father said that they ought to be getting back to bed. But Store-Hans seemed well contented where he was.

"Are you going to start early to-morrow?"

"I suppose so."

"How long will you be gone?"

"That depends on how far I have to go."

"There won't be any danger if the Indians come back while you are away. . . . I can talk to them, you know!"

"Right you are, son! . . . Nothing to worry about as long as I have you here at home!"

Then Per Hansa got up and carried the boy back to bed. Store-Hans fell asleep almost as soon as his head touched the pillow. But some time later in the night he suddenly rose to his knees.

"Here I come, Rosie!" he cried out, clearly—then sank back in a heap on the pillow, and slept on.

XI

At the first faint streaks of day Per Hansa slipped out of bed, made a fire, and put on the coffeepot. His wife, he noticed, was already awake. He told her to stay in bed;

this she made no reply in words, but she got up immediately, dressed herself, and began to prepare him a meal. small lamp burned in the room; the day was yet too young give much light.

Per Hansa sat down at the table and began to eat; the ffee wasn't quite ready; his wife stood over by the stove, aiting for it to boil. An air of fixed determination hung out her; although she had not spoken, he felt it just the me.

All night long Beret had been lying there with her eyes ide open, staring up at a picture that would not go away; picture of a nameless, blue-green solitude, flat, endless, ill, with nothing to hide behind. . . . Some cows were azing on it. . . . Yes, animals of flesh and blood were ere . . . and in the next moment they were not there! . . .

The picture had been full of unearthly, awful suggestions. he had lain awake in terror, lost in her own imaginings, restling with fearsome thoughts that only increased the read in her soul. . . . And now he was leaving her—now e would probably stay away for a long time and she would ave no knowledge of where he was faring. . . . It must ave been the Indians who had taken the cows. Could it ave been anything else—could it have been? . . . She knew o well how hasty and fearless her husband was, plunging eadlong into whatever lay before him! . . . The thought ade her tremble.

. . . It seemed plain to her now that human life could not dure in this country. She had lived here for six weeks d more without seeing another civilized face than those of eir own company. Not a settled habitation of man lay arer than several days' journey; if any visitor came, it as a savage, a wild man, whom one must fear! . . . To get hat supplies they needed they must journey four whole ays, and make preparations as if for a voyage to Lofoten! . . What would happen if something sudden should befall em . . . attack, or sickness, or fire . . . yes, what would ey do?

. . . Ah no, this wasn't a place for human beings to dwell in. . . . And then, what of the children? Suppose they were to grow up here, would they not come to be exactly like the red children of the wilderness—or perhaps something worse? . . . It was uncivilized; they would not learn the ways of man; no civilization would ever come. . . . Never, never, would it be otherwise!

. . . Perhaps, then, it was an act of Providence that the cattle had been lost. . . . It ought to show them how things stood out here—that man could not exist in this savage, desolate wilderness; they ought to be able to see that much, at any rate. . . . Even he might see it, too! . . .

She could not tell whether she had slept at all that night; it did not seem so; she had heard her husband's first move when he began to stir. She remembered, too, the last thought she had been struggling with in bed; she shuddered at it, now that there was a light in the house. There in the darkness she had felt that it would be a blessing if the cows never turned up. . . . How could she ever have thought it? That, too, was only a part of the hideous evil out here! . . .

"You aren't going alone?" she asked, from over by the stove.

He had not mentioned going yet; he gave her a quick look.

"We'll see."

"Will you be gone long?"

"You'd better not look for me till you see me. . . . I may be gone overnight."

She asked no more for a time; in a few moments she came and poured out his coffee.

"Which way are you going?"

"I don't exactly know yet. . . . Eastward, I suppose."

"You are doing a wrong thing, and I must tell you so!" she said, decisively, putting the coffeepot back on the stove. . . . "A wrong thing!" she repeated with even more emphasis.

The vehemence of her tone took hold of him.

"Perhaps it is," he answered, rather meekly. . . . "But we must try to get the cows back somehow, just the same."

"No more than the others!" she exclaimed, her agitation ddenly flaring up. . . . "If they can do without them, we L too!"

But look here, Beret," he reasoned, trying to calm her, »u know that it's necessary for some one to go and look the cattle. Hans Olsa hasn't time to do it, because of haying; and as for the others, I haven't much faith in
m. . . . There aren't many to choose from here, you »w."

Does it seem right to you, then," she burst out, wildly, at I should be left alone here with the children while you chasing around in the wilderness? . . . You may be gone a day or a week—how can I know? . . . Why can't n or Henry go? They have no one sitting at home wait-for them!" She did not look up from the floor while was speaking; deep passion burned in her words.

. . Now she has fallen into one of her unreasonable ods, thought Per Hansa; but perhaps she couldn't help poor thing! . . . "It's this way, Beret, you see: I don't eve it would be any use for those fellows to go."

Then Tönseten will have to do it!" . . . Now she was ng to cry—he heard it in her voice.

Oh, God Almighty! . . . then the cows would surely ne home!" he groaned, not far from tears himself.

She did not answer; her rigid form remained standing r by the window, staring out into the drab, dismal dawn.
Per Hansa said no more, either; he gulped down his coffee riedly, found his hat and put it on; then he went to the r, paused an instant, opened it quietly, and stepped out-
e. There he stood still for a moment. . . . No, no—he ldn't leave Beret this way! . . . But what had struck
? It was beyond his comprehension! She had more mon sense than any other person he knew; yet here she , talking more unreasonably than a cross child. What nge influence had come over her since they had arrived here? . . . He oughtn't to leave her this way—but what ld he do? . . . In a deep quandary, he walked over to woodpile, saddled and bridled the pony, which was ered close by . . . then paused again.

XII

Before he could make up his mind to jump into the saddl he heard footfalls behind him, and turned toward the house It had flashed through his mind: here she is coming now everything will be all right and I can be off at once. . . . need to hurry!

But in the same flash he had realized that it wasn't fron the direction of the door that the sound had come. . . He turned to find Hans Olsa rounding the corner of th house. Did Hans Olsa think of going? Well, that wa another matter; that man was equal to any task. But wh would drive the mowing machine while he was gone? An it looked like fine weather for making hay—it seemed to b clearing. . . . All these thoughts passed through Pe Hansa's head as he watched his neighbour draw near; h wished that Hans Olsa hadn't come just now . . . no, no just now! His usual frankness was lacking in his greeting

"You seem to be out early, Hans Olsa."

"And so are you, I see. I sort of expected it; I wante to talk to you before you went. . . . You're going, aren' you?"

Per Hansa glanced aside and did not answer immediately at last he said, after a long pause: "Some one will have t go, I suppose. . . . It seems best for you to keep on wit the haying, so that we can get the job done. . . . I am n hand at machinery, you know."

"I know that you can ride faster than I can—that is th better reason. . . . Guess what Sörrina told me last night?"

Per Hansa made no attempt at it; he wasn't in a mood t solve riddles just now. His eyes were on his neighbour, bu his thoughts were in the house. . . . She must have hear their voices by this time. . . . Would she come out?

. . . "Well," said Hans Olsa, raising his eyebrows signif icantly, "yesterday morning Sörrina suspected that cow o ours of wanting male company!"

Per Hansa came back to reality with a violent jolt.

"What's that you say, Hans Olsa?"

Those were her very words—'male company'! . . . Do suppose that old cow of mine could have taken it into head to ramble all the way back to Fillmore County, for that—and the others followed her? . . . The idea urred to me, anyway; and I thought it best to tell you nce, before you got away."

Ha-ha! . . . Ha-ha! . . . She had to have a man, that dame of yours—and led the others with her into temp-on!"

. . . "Well, who knows?"

Good enough!" . . . Per Hansa leaned forward and un- the horse; he sprang quickly into the saddle. . . . "I thinking of the Trönders all last night; now I'm going - and make them a visit. There's no telling when you'll me back. Perhaps you'll keep an eye on things for me , while I am gone?" . . . He paused, glanced toward house, and added in a low voice: "Be sure and send rina over here to-night. . . . And you keep on with the ng as hard as you can; it looks to me as if it were going lear up soon!"

e headed the pony past the house and around it to the where the door lay; there he drew up, coughed loudly, ned a moment—then rode away.

. . . In the window looking toward the east a woman's , tear-stained and swollen with weeping, watched his re grow less and less in the dim grey light of the break-day, until at last it had disappeared altogether. . . . To it seemed as though he were sinking deeper and deeper an unknown, lifeless sea; the sombre greyness rose and ered him.

oon the word was passed around that Per Hansa had set eastward to the Sioux River, to look for the cattle; every- was willing to let the matter rest at that. His pony was -footed; there was no need for any of the others to take he search; they had better wait to see what luck he had.

Not that Tönseten had any faith or hope in the trip. had kept turning the matter over in his mind all night;

he had got from Kjersti a detailed account of how the catt had behaved when the Indians came, and when he had rise that morning he had been fully convinced that Sam's solutio of the riddle was the right and only one. To Tönseten mind, all that remained of the problem was how to get hol of the beasts again without causing bloodshed and war— how to wrest them from the possession of the redskins befor they had gobbled them all up. . . . When he heard of Pe Hansa's intended visit to the Trönders, he spluttered wit anger; he was disgusted, too, with Hans Olsa because he ha not dissuaded him from such a brainless move. . . . But hi anger at Per Hansa simply knew no bounds. So—he wa not the courageous fellow, then, that he posed as being Didn't he know that the responsibility for getting the cattl back rested solely on him? For he had been the one wh was so friendly with that robber brood. He hadn't chase them back where they had come from, as he should hav done. Oh no, he had taken gifts from them instead—an been gloriously fooled into the bargain! And why did h waste his time now, in revelling with the Trönders on th Sioux River? The man had better be made to understan that they needed their cows at once! . . . Tönseten wen about breathing fire and brimstone, and didn't care wh heard him.

The gloom of this loss lay heavy upon the others as well they went about their work as usual, but their eyes strayed elsewhere.

Evening came, but neither Per Hansa nor the cattle Folks did not care to go to bed; they sat about staring an waiting. All of Hans Olsa's family went over to Beret's Tönseten and Kjersti, having first stopped at Hans Olsa' and found them out, went there, too. The Solum boys coul see no reason for moping around their hut alone; they soo joined the others. . . . But none of them found cheer in thi place, either. Beret seemed distant and strangely calm, a if the whole affair didn't in the least concern her. The wondered at her manner, it was no unnatural.

When they were leaving, however, she said quietly, as if ing to herself:

Somehow, I can't figure this out. . . . Night has come ; Per Hansa is wandering off there alone in this endless erness. And four grown men are sitting here talking time away. . . . But aren't the cattle just as much theirs his? . . . No, I can't seem to figure it out at all. . . ."

ver in the bed little And-Ongen began to cry for her er; the mother went and sat down beside her; she kept eyes on the floor. Her words still lingered in the air; a voice cared to answer. There seemed to be nothing ay, and the silence only made the gloom deeper. . . . hen the others had gone and the children were asleep, t rose and hung some heavy clothes up over the win-s—the thickest clothes she could find—to shut out the t. She felt that she could never go to bed, with all the out there staring in upon her. . . .

. . Last of all, she pulled the big chest in front of the .

XIII

ne following day there was no getting the boys down the roof; they climbed up immediately after breakfast sat there hour after hour. The forenoon passed; noon e. Ole jumped down to eat, but Store-Hans remained at post; the mother let him stay. Coffee time finally went et no one in sight. . . .

nen, all of a sudden, eager shouts rang out from the ; Store-Hans was screaming in an excited voice that . . . right over there . . . dad was coming! . . . Yes, he was coming! Ole's voice joined in. . . . And he has attle with him, too!

Come on—let's run and tell the others!" cried Ole. . . . ther first!" shrieked Store-Hans, forgetting that they both been shouting the news. They jumped down from roof together, jerked open the door, and announced in breath that their father was coming; the next instant they were gone. The word was first carried to Hans Ols then to Tönseten, last of all to the Solum boys. In ea place the same message: "Dad is com ng!"—that from O . . . "And he's got the cows!"—this from Store-Hans.

Sure enough, here came Per Hansa riding the pony, a driving before him a small herd of cows. As the carav came in sight from the several huts, each family proceed to count the animals. . . . What was the meaning of thi Were they seeing double? . . . They counted over aga with the same result; every person who tried his hand g one cow too many! There should be only four—now the were five. No getting away from it: five there were! Th were easy enough to count; they straggled over the prair one by one, like beads on a string. . . . Per Hansa on t pony brought up the rear.

As the people stood outside, looking at the approachi train, they instinctively set out for Per Hansa's. Each h to get his own cow; all were eager to learn where Per Han had been these last two days, and to find out about th fifth cow!

The last question had already been answered in par before the train had arrived they had made out that the fif animal wasn't a cow at all! No cow, indeed—but a yearli bull! . . . Per Hansa himself was barely recognizable; h face was grimy and streaked with sweat, which had be running down it in streams, and still ran as freely as eve But what they first noticed about the man was that he carri something strapped to his chest—some sort of a box, looked like. . . . No—wonder of wonders!—it was a bi cage, made of thin slats; and inside lay a rooster and tw hens!

Beret had stepped outside the house at last; she came fo ward without paying any attention to the others; they fe embarrassed now, and did not dare to approach her; son of them even shrank back as she came near.

. . . "Per, what have you brought?" she asked in a lo tender voice, as if she were shy of him.

Per Hansa was unfastening the cage; he seemed wearied the point of stupor.

Oh, well," he said with an effort, "since I had to go so I thought I might as well do something worth while." . He handed her the cage. . . . "Here are your chickens, et. . . . I don't know whether there's any life left in n yet, or not."

eret took the cage, turned slowly away, and walked ard the house. The others all thronged about him, eager near what adventures he had met with.

önseten pushed in ahead:

I say, Per Hansa, who is that fellow you brought with rest of the cattle?"

he shadow of a grin brightened the grimy face:

That fellow? . . . Oh, just a Trönder."

Oh-ho! . . . then he must be a good one! Trönders, say. . . . But where did you pick him up?"

er Hansa pretended not to hear; he dismounted and w the bridle to Store-Hans. . . . "Water him now, and him well! . . . Where did I pick that fellow up? Oh, guiled a kind Trönder woman into letting me take him a year. I promised her ten dollars into the bargain; makes exactly two dollars and a half for your share, ert. But that'll be cheaper for you in the long run, you than to chase up and down the whole of Dakota Terri- looking for your cow!"

Sörine and Kjersti were both very outspoken in their tude to Per Hansa; they plainly meant every word that said. But it seemed to Per Hansa that the deepest l of wisdom on this occasion was offered by Kjersti. stood listening patiently until the story of his long ride come to an end; then she remarked, as if quietly musing:

When lust can be so strong in a dumb brute, what mustn't in a human being! . . . I shall never forget this trick have turned, Per Hansa!"

. At that they all laughed heartily.

IV. What the Waving Grass Revealed

I

THAT summer Per Hansa was transported, was ca ried farther and ever farther away on the wings
a wondrous fairy tale—a romance in which he w both prince and king, the sole possessor of countless trea ures. In this, as in all other fairy tales, the story grew ev more fascinating and dear to the heart, the farther it a vanced. Per Hansa drank it in; he was like the child wl constantly cries: "More—more!"

These days he was never at rest, except when fatigue h overcome him and sleep had taken him away from toil a care. But this was seldom, however; he found his tas too interesting to be a burden; nothing tired him, out he Ever more beautiful grew the tale; ever more dazzling shone the sunlight over the fairy castle.

How could he steal the time to rest, these days? W he not owner of a hundred and sixty acres of the best la in the world? Wasn't his title to it becoming more firm established with every day that passed and every new-brok furrow that turned? . . . He gazed at his estate and laugh happily, as if at some pleasant and amusing spectacle. . .
Such soil! Only to sink the plow into it, to turn over t sod—and there was a field ready for seeding. . . . And th was not just ordinary soil, fit for barley, and oats, and pot toes, and hay, and that sort of thing; indeed, it had be meant for much finer and daintier uses; it was the soil f wheat, the king of all grains! Such soil had been especia created by the good Lord to bear this noble seed; and he was Per Hansa, walking around on a hundred and six acres of it, all his very own!

A beautiful, alluring thought had begun to beckon him. s first quarter-section was rightly only tillage land; the arter next to it to the east would be about what he needed r hay and pasture for the cattle; yes, he could even use e one to the west of it, too, if his plans worked out; but he nted the one to the east first, for it had open water on the ek. These two quarter-sections would make an estate re magnificent than that of many a king of old. . . . He er mentioned this dream to anyone; he could see no way present of getting hold of another quarter; but his boys re growing bigger day by day; in time they would be able earn the wherewithal. . . . No hurry yet . . . this was t the beginning!

And there were many other tantalizing, delectable ughts, of things that would have to come first, before the e estate was won. The live stock, for instance; in the rse of time he would have great numbers—horses and s and cattle, chickens and ducks and geese—animals both and small, of every kind. There would be quacking and nting, mooing and neighing, from every nook and corner the farm. . . . The place would need plenty of life, for Beret to mother!

But dearest to him of all, and most delectable, was the ught of the royal mansion which he had already erected his mind. There would be houses for both chickens and s, roomy stables, a magnificent storehouse and barn . . . l then the splendid palace itself! The royal mansion uld shine in the sun—it would stand out far and wide! e palace itself would be white, with green cornices; but big barn would be as red as blood, with cornices of driven w. Wouldn't it be beautiful—wasn't it going to be great ! . . . And he and his boys would build it all!

And stranger things than this transpired in fancy—just in the fairy tale: they seemed to lie enchanted under the st prosaic and deceptive semblances, invisible to the eye man; but then he came and touched them, pouring on a drops from the magic horn; the charm was instantly ken, and behold, treasures sprang forth, shining in all their newborn freshness and beauty! . . . Just now, for instance, he beheld a vision so fair that his face shone with a glowing light that transfigured his coarse features; he had suddenly discovered a new object outside the palace of his dreams. . . . Yes, sir—there it was! Nothing less than a snow-white picket fence around a big, big garden! And many trees grew there, both within and without; some bore apples, others various kinds of fruit: and some . . . some had cones . . . yes, trees with pine cones on them! . . . Per Hansa's eyes swam and shone; a sudden moisture dimmed his sight; dear God, there really were pine cones hanging from some of the trees! . . . He didn't know where they waited for him, those trees . . . but they would come! . . .

And so Per Hansa could not be still for a moment. A divine restlessness ran in his blood; he strode forward with outstretched arms toward the wonders of the future, already partly realized. He seemed to have the elfin, playful spirit of a boy; at times he was irresistible; he had to caress everything that he came near. . . . But he never could be still. To remain inactive over the Sabbath would drive him into a fit of ill humour; by noon he had to go outdoors and stir around. If nothing else turned up, he took a long jaunt over the prairies; on these trips he selected many a pretty spot that would be a fine site for a home. . . . Some day a settler will locate here, he thought; I'll remember this, and show him where to build! . . . Wherever he went, no matter how far, he found the same kind of soil.

. . . Endless it was, and wonderful! . . .

II

One Sunday evening the boys had come home wild with excitement. They had made a long trip westward on the prairie to some big swamps which lay out there, with tall grass growing from them, and long stretches of open water in between. They told of thousands upon thousands of ducks, so tame that you could almost take them in your hand.

ore-Hans vowed that never in his life had he seen anything
e it. He described the ducks, how many and how tame y were, until the words stuck in his throat, and his whole dy trembled; his brother raged on even worse.

From then on the boys were always talking about the cks. Was there no way to get them? . . . But they had shotgun, the father said, and Old Maria had not been ilt for that purpose; as it was, they had only a small supply
"feed" for her, which must be kept in case . . . well, no e could tell. Just what it was that "no one could tell," he n't say; but they understood this much that no ducks uld ever be shot with that gun. So the ducks continued live there, swimming leisurely about in countless numbers, d flying from one pond to the next whenever the boys me too close. And not even a good-sized pebble to be nd . . . plague take it all!

Ever since the boys had first discovered the ducks they d made a practice of going out to look at them every nday. Each time the birds seemed to have multiplied in mbers. Soon the boys never pretended to speak of any-ng else between themselves; they thought only of the cks, and of how to get hold of them. . . . Their father d not yet found time to go with them and behold this nder.

Then one Sunday afternoon, in the early part of August,
r Hansa went for a stroll westward with Store-Hans.
e was told to stay at home; it would never do to let mother there alone, the father said, when she had three grown n in the family; Ole, the older of the two boys, would ve to take his turn first. The boy raised such a common over this disappointment that his mother said they had tter take him along. The father was firm, however; next nday he himself would stay at home, and then Ole could
; but to-day the boy must do as he had been told.

So it fell to Per Hansa and Store-Hans to make the trip
ne. Plenty of ducks there were, no doubt about that.
nen he first saw the place Per Hansa was reminded of the great bird cliffs in Finmarken. Store-Hans pointed at the birds, whispering hoarsely to his father, until he choked, and tears came in his eyes.

—Wasn't there any possible way to get a few of 'em?

—Well—the father seemed quite serious—one might try salt on their tails.

—Salt on their tails? Was that any good?

—Oh yes—they often did it in the olden days.

But then the father had to laugh, and that spoiled it all. As he stood there gazing longingly at the birds no boy could have been more thrilled by the wonderful spectacle. By George! there would have to be some way out of this fix; he'd have to make a way when he got time to cast about! . . . Maybe the fairy tale had nothing to say about the king's having a shotgun; but he ate plenty of ducks, just the same! . . . What had been done once could be done again!

Store-Hans didn't exactly approve of his father's jocular air; this was no fooling matter. If he only wanted to, he could easily rig up some sort of a contrivance for catching them; he could work miracles when he tried . . . Well then, why didn't he begin to get busy. He certainly saw how thick they were! . . .

But Store-Hans had to possess his soul in patience awhile longer; no birds were captured on their first trip to the swamps.

It was on the way home from this trip that Per Hansa made his startling discovery. Store-Hans had taken a short cut home; he had to hurry back and tell his brother what they had seen. But the father never liked to follow an old path while there was still unexplored land left around him; accordingly, he made a long détour to the westward. He had often wondered how far west his land extended, but had never taken the time to pace it off. Since he was headed in that direction now, he might as well pace down the western border line of his and his neighbours' new kingdom.

He had a pretty good idea of the location of Tönseten's south line, as well as of the corners on it where his east and est lines began; the southeast corner, in fact, was near önseten's house. He cut across country until he judged mself to be about on this south line, and walked east for me distance; then he decided that it would be too far to go the way in, just to pick up the corner; so he turned west ain. He would have to be satisfied with an approximate sition of Tönseten's southwest corner to-day. . . . About rre, it ought to be, he thought; he stopped, gazed around, d took his bearings for the walk north. He had been llowing this course for perhaps a hundred paces when e toe of his boot suddenly struck against a small stake—l little fellow who stood hiding there, nodding in drowsy mesomeness, just at the edge of a thick tuft of grass. Per ansa looked down, saw the stake, and brought up with a olent start. . . . Here was Tönseten's southwest corner! 'hat, had Syvert been so cautious as to put down stakes re, too? A very careful man was Syvert, indeed!

Per Hansa bent down closer to examine the stake. Yes, was right—it was a corner stake; there stood the desiption, indicating both section and quarter. But the name llow . . . the name . . . good God! what was this? He opped to his knees and peered at it until the letters danced fore his eyes; he wondered if he were dreaming. The me on the stake wasn't S. H. Tönseten at all, as it should ve been; it was just O'Hara . . . nothing else but 'Hara! The letters had been carved on the stake with a ife, and the arrow pointed east, to Tönseten's quarter! . . When Per Hansa finally rose, he smoothed the grass refully over with his hand, where his knees had bent it to e ground; the action was quite involuntary.

. . . "Well!" he exclaimed, and walked hastily away. ut presently he stopped, turned around, and went back to e stake, to read the name once more. In order to be sure at his eyes hadn't deceived him, he spelled it out letter by tter, tracing the carving with his forefinger. . . . No doubt out it—the thing was true!

And now he laid his course to the northward, walking slowly. The radiant, happy look had vanished from his face; it looked old and worn. All at once, as if struck by a new thought, he quickened his pace. He hurried on until he had reached the vicinity of Hans Olsa's south line, dividing his land from Tönseten's; here he began to search the ground, first to the eastward, then to the westward, working slowly forward into the next quarter-section.

At last he found it—another stake, Hans Olsa's southwest corner! . . . He looked carefully around; no one was in sight. Then he fell on his knees and examined the stake; he didn't bother to glance at the description this time; but the name—the name! Tears suddenly came to his eyes as he stooped over; for an instant he found it hard to see. . . . But there it was, exactly as he had feared; this stake had Joe Gill carved on it . . . Joe Gill, when it should have been H. P. Olsen! . . . He got up at last; his round, jovial face now looked drawn and sinister.

Moving mechanically, he strode toward the north until he had reached the line between Hans Olsa's quarter and his own; there he repeated his tactics of a while before, zigzagging back and forth over a broad space; but though he kept tacking around for a long time, he was unable to locate any stake. That a stake was there, however, he felt very certain; it was unthinkable that this misfortune should have befallen both Tönseten and Hans Olsa, and not have run him down at the same time. . . . He searched until he had to give it up in despair; then he went north to the line between himself and Henry Solum, and fell to searching in this locality; but no, he couldn't find any stake here, either. It was now growing so late that he had to quit and go home. . . . A short while before, he had been as happy and light-hearted as a child; he came home full of a weariness greater than he had ever known. . . .

VI

. . . By God! the trolls must be after him! It was only natural that he should meet them somewhere out here; but think of their coming in just this dirty fashion! . . . Ah, ell, trolls were trolls, no matter how they came! . . .

Per Hansa didn't know what to do with himself that eve- ng; he felt that the only thing that would relieve him just w would be to hitch the oxen to the plow and break a retch of new land. He looked longingly at the oxen, and the plow over yonder. . . . No, it was the Sabbath—and ening already.

His discovery had been so utterly disheartening that he uld not have mentioned it to anyone for the price of his ul. He would have liked to tell his wife about it, and ar her opinion; but that was out of the question; she was sturbed enough already. . . . But Per Hansa had to do mething, or he would go mad; he walked across the yard d sat down on the woodpile; there he remained a long hile, staring listlessly at the ground.

. . . These trolls would not be easy to cope with—not if knew them! . . . But why hadn't he been able to discover eir tracks on his own quarter? That was the strangest ing of all!

The boys were only waiting for a chance to talk with their ther, now he had been west to the swamps and had seen w thick the birds were there. They came up and spoke him, but got no response; first one of them tried, and en the other; soon they both were talking at him together; little later their mother came out and asked him something, t he paid no attention. He sat there in a silence like a one wall. . . .

He's probably thinking of the ducks, Store-Hans decided; e knowledge made him very happy. Of course he was inking of the ducks, and would soon hit upon some fine ay to capture them! . . . At last Store-Hans could no nger restrain himself; he edged over to his father's side, d his hand on the stout thigh, and said in a deep joy: . . . "Weren't there a lot of 'em, Dad?" . . .

"What?"

"Did you ever see so many ducks in all your life?"

"Ducks? . . . No."

"You think we can get some of them, don't you?" asked the boy, in a hushed, confidential tone.

But the father made no answer; he was already far away and did not hear. Just then the mother came out with the milk pail on her arm and called loudly to Rosie. This reached Per Hansa's ears; he got up and took the pail from her. . . . "I might as well do the milking, since I'm only sitting here idling away my time." . . . He seemed so absent-minded that she looked hard at him; as he walked away his head drooped forward, his shoulders were slouched down, his whole body seemed strangely shrunken. . . .

The next morning he was up earlier than usual; he left the house without saying a word. As soon as he was gone, Beret got up and went to the window to see what became of him. The early dawn was still in the sky; she saw him stride off westward; soon the slope of the hill hid him from view. . . . It's only the ducks, she thought; I'm glad that he and the boys have found some diversion; but just the same, he ought not to wear himself out over such trifling things. . . . Beret turned away from the window, her face heavy with sadness.

The boys were up and the food was on the table when Per Hansa returned. . . . He was heated as if from a brisk walk, his wife noticed. She had to look at him a second time; there was something queer about his face this morning; it seemed so hard set and forbidding; although it glowed with the heat of his body, it lacked any warmth of expression. Instinctively she asked:

"Is anything wrong with you, Per?"

"No." . . . But he did not look up.

As soon as he had eaten he left the table, telling the boys to come along and help him; now was a good time to pace out the west line of their land; it had to be done soon, anyway; perhaps they would break a stretch of ground out there. . . . His words sounded cold and distant; he went out, and said no more.

Beret watched him narrowly. . . . There's certainly something the matter with him, she thought.

Striking west from the house, Per Hansa paralleled his n south line, between his land and Hans Olsa's; he knew ctly how far in from this line the house had been built;
he merely kept along with it, counting the paces. When had reached the western limit of his quarter, he stood l; the grass had been trampled down all over the place.
. "This is where it ought to be; the line should run aight north from here." . . . He walked a few paces th to show them the direction. . . . "There ought to be mall black stake driven down in the grass here somewhere, I can't seem to find it. Let's go south first; look sharp
l see if you can't pick it up. If we don't find it there, ll go the other way. Keep your eyes open, now, every o!"

"When did you put a stake down here?" asked Ole.

His father apparently didn't hear him. . . . "It ought to right here; funny, that we can't find it! . . . The cattle st have tramped it into the ground."

All three of them kept searching steadily the whole fore-n; the father seemed so excited, and walked so fast, that boys could hardly keep up with him. They made tack er tack, north until they stood on Henry's land, south to ns Olsa's; they did not go in single file, but walked east, four or five paces apart.

. . "Look in the grass, boys—look carefully in the ss!" the father repeated a thousand times.

Whenever they reached the end of the line they zigzagged
t and west; they looked everywhere, and combed the und; but with all their labour and painstaking care, no ke could be found. The boys noticed something very odd ut their father's manner: the longer their search went unsuccessfully, the less impenetrable became that wall isolation around him. When they finally stopped on the tack, looked around, and saw that they had covered ry possible place, his voice sounded almost joyful. . . .
must be that the cows have tramped it down! . . . Well, harm done . . . it was nothing but an old stick, anyway."

IV

Beret soon came to realize that he was absorbed in things of which she was not to know. Whenever she happened to speak to him unexpectedly he seemed to be present and yet absent; even when he made an effort to converse naturally, he kept her at a distance; all his ardour seemed to have disappeared, and with it the childlike joyousness that she had loved so much in him, though she had been unable to respond to it. . . . No more did she hear his cheerful, fairy-tale banter about the royal mansion, and the king and queen; she was aware how often he lay awake at night, or tossed restlessly about in his sleep. . . . In a short while she became fully convinced that something had happened at last which he had to conceal from her; but she could not imagine what it might be. The whole affair was so unlike him, that it worried her night and day. . . . What, in Heaven's name, could there be to conceal out here?

This mood lasted with him throughout the week. On the morning of the next Monday he was up early. . . . Beret had been lying awake the latter part of the night, feeling keenly that he was wrestling beside her with a monster which would not leave him in peace; but after a while she had fallen asleep again. When she finally opened her eyes the dim grey of dawn was creeping through the window; her husband was up and gone. The room somehow gave her the sensation that he must have left a long time ago; not a sound could be heard anywhere. . . . Beret got up, dressed herself hurriedly, and went outdoors. The plow was still there, she noticed, and the oxen lay a short distance from the house; but Per Hansa was nowhere in sight. . . . She felt so forlorn, so helpless, filled as she was with gnawing loneliness. Here she stood, abandoned in the great solitude, not knowing where he had gone nor what the trouble was. . . . What had happened to him? What was he struggling with, that had to be kept from her? . . . She called his name aloud a couple of times; but her voice trembled so strangely that she did not dare to call again. The sound died away nheeded. . . . It seemed to Beret that she had never felt ae awful desolation of the place weigh so heavily upon her s on this morning.

In the meantime Per Hansa was engaged in a very curious sk west on the prairie. He had risen before daylight; ad gone out and hunted up the spade, which he had stuck nder his arm; then he had started off in a general westerly rection. He made a longer détour than necessary around ans Olsa's house, watching closely as he went by to see if nyone there was up and stirring; once safely past, he uickened his gait. . . . So he came to a place at the south-est corner of Hans Olsa's land, where a black imp stood odding sleepily in the grass; there he came to a halt and oked about in all directions. . . . Not a soul to be seen. is eyes were snapping now; his mouth was tight and rawn; all his features seemed hardened into solid rock. . . . God!" he muttered, "Hans Olsa has got himself into a nice ess!" . . . He grasped the thing firmly, pulled it slowly ut of the ground, and laid it aside with great care. Then e examined the hole, planning what he had better do; when e was finished, it was going to be hard to see that here a ake had ever been standing! He worked now with deep rethought and cunning; first he brought some loose soil om a distance in the spade, and filled the hole almost to the p; next he stopped it up with a sod plug; the grass of the ug grew as stout and green as that around it; he also took od care not to tramp down the grass near the hole, placing s feet lightly, as if he were afraid to rest his full weight t them.

At last he had finished and stood regarding his handi-ork. . . . "If they only give the grass time to grow a ttle. I'll be damned if they can chase Hans Olsa away on count of that stick of wood!" . . . Then Per Hansa went to the place when he had found the stake of Tönseten's nd; here he repeated the performance, but was even more reful not to trample down the grass.

When he returned home that morning he did not arrive om the west, but from the north. The boys were eating breakfast; the mother was busy, but she kept a watch through the window; she saw him come into the yard, stop by the woodpile and throw down the spade—then pause and glance hastily toward the house; but she went on with her work as if she had noticed nothing. Soon after she heard his footfall outside, passing along the wall. . . . He had gone into the stable! . . . He stayed there for some time before he came into the house.

As he entered the room Beret glanced at him from the corner of her eye. . . . Yes, there he stood, the man she knew . . . but in his face shone something hard and menacing. . . . To-day they were going to plow, he told the boys—yes, plow! Both they and the oxen would get their bellyful. . . . His voice had the same unnatural, metallic hardness as his face; it seemed as if sparks flew when he spoke.

The stable was unoccupied as yet; at present it served as tool room, carpenter shop, and storehouse combined; Beret also used it for hanging spare clothes. . . . After they were gone, she happened to go into the stable looking for some garments that needed mending. There, quite by chance, she found the stakes; Per Hansa had hidden them behind the clothes. Burnt black to withstand the moisture, they hardly differed in colour from the walls; she would not have seen them at all, except for the carved letters; these stood out in the natural colour of the wood and looked like large worms in the black sod; they startled her—she had to see what they were. She picked the two stakes up and stood turning them over in her hands. . . . Here were some figures and letters . . . more letters, that joined together and made something like names. . . . "Joe Gill," said one; the other, "O'Hara." . . .

. . . What strange names, she thought. . . . Did people really have such names? If so, they must be Indians! . . . She kept turning the stakes over and over. The ends tapered down to a sharp point; they must have been made to stand in the ground; in fact, little particles of soil were clinging to them now. Where could Per Hansa have found them? . . . She put them back, found the garments she was looking for, returned to the house, and sat down to mend. . . .

But she could not dismiss those mysterious stakes from her mind. . . . What did the numbers mean . . . the numbers and letters . . . and then, the names? . . . They must be landmarks. And they had been standing in the ground, too. . . . It suddenly occurred to her that he must have put them in there recently; it was only last week that she had hung up those clothes. . . . Perhaps . . . could he have done it this very morning? . . . She laid her work aside and went out to the stable to examine them once more. . . . Yes, certainly they had been in the ground—just so far down they had been!

Back at her sewing again, her hands moved more and more slowly as she thought. . . . He had been struggling with something which must be kept from her. . . . His voice was sharper to-day, his face more determined. . . . It must be that he had brought them back with him this morning. . . . . . Her thoughts slowly began to spin; the longer they spun, the less she liked the web; after a while she became so frightened that her hand shook and she had to drop her sewing. . . .

When he came home for dinner, she told herself, she would ask him for an explanation of this matter; her fear was somewhat appeased by this resolution. . . . But then he came, still in a rigid, forbidding mood; and her thoughts grew so unspeakably dark and ugly that she could not utter them. At the same time, he seemed relieved in a measure, and more like himself.

After supper that night she heard him go into the stable and rummage around; then he came out and went across the yard. She stole to her post at the window; there he stood by the block, chopping up a stick of wood; it was burnt black, and tapered at one end; it had stood in the ground. He picked up every piece that he had split and cut them into short kindling wood! . . . He took another black stick and did the same with it. . . . Then he went down on his knees and began to gather the kindling, piece by piece, on his arm. . . . Now, what in the world. . . . Here he came, bringing it all into the house! . . .

Beret had timidly withdrawn to the corner by the stove; he saw her standing there but did not look at her directly; then he took off the lid of the stove and dumped in the armful of kindling.

. . . "Are you making a fire now?"

"Just some rubbish I picked up around the chopping block."

She wanted to run around the stove and stop him, but could not; she felt that her knees would not carry her even those few steps. A question trembled on her lips; she must ask him now . . . but the words would not come . . . her tongue refused to obey.

. . . No, she could not ask such a question! . . . It was so hideous, so utterly appalling, the thought which she harboured; God forgive him, he was meddling with other folks' landmarks! . . . How often she had heard it said, both here and in the old country: a blacker sin than this a man could hardly commit against his fellows![1]

She stood motionless in the corner beyond the stove, watching her husband burn the proofs of his guilt; the terror that possessed her now was immeasurably greater than that which she had felt in the morning, when she had called his name and got no answer. . . .

. . . That night Per Hansa slept the sleep of the righteous in spite of what he had done; now it was Beret who had a monster to wrestle with. . . .

V

During the weeks that followed, Per Hansa's temper made him hard of approach; the man seemed driven by a restless

[1] In the light of Norwegian peasant psychology, Beret's fear is easily understandable; for a more heinous crime than meddling with other people's landmarks could hardly be imagined. In fact, the crime was so dark that a special punishment after death was meted out to it. The visionary literature of the Middle Ages gives many examples.

nergy, an indomitable will that knew but one course—to reak as much new land as possible each day. . . . "Do you tend to break the whole quarter-section this fall?" Hans lsa asked him more than once. He had broken a large art of it already; a new piece was added every day; but ill he found no rest, nor would the joyous peace of the rly summer return to him. . . . His face now always wore at forbidding, menacing look, which often would flare up to a flame, and his voice would suddenly be hard as flint.

Before his thoughts stood ever the same problem: How ould it turn out when the trolls came? Would he be able hack off their heads and wrest the kingdom from their ower? . . . It might happen that he would be going about ith some object in his hand, and would suddenly grip it ard; all his strength would be needed to wield the enchanted word. . . . For these would be archtrolls, no less. Here ey had come and, disregarding all law and justice, had ken land in an unlawful manner.

There was another chain of thought which frequently led im on: Perhaps these men would never come back? hey might just have happened along here the previous fall, efore Tönseten arrived; have taken a liking to the place, nd put down their stakes; and then have failed to go to the nd office until after Tönseten's visit there, at which time ey would have found their claims taken up and recorded y another; or still more likely, for some reason or other ey had never gone to the land office at all, but had allowed eir claims to go by default. . . . That might have hapened.

. . . But no, the explanation didn't sound reasonable; ose stakes hadn't stood in the ground all winter—they idn't look that way. . . . By God! the trolls had arrived fter Tönseten's sod house had been built; they had "beheld e land, and seen that it was good"! . . . So, there was othing to do but wait for them to come back. . . . Not by breath or a syllable did Per Hansa betray the secret of hat he had done. At one time he had strongly considered elling Hans Olsa, but had finally given up the idea; better to keep him out of this for the time being! . . . In all this trouble, it never once occurred to him that had there been a prior claim on these quarters, Tönseten and Hans Olsa couldn't have filed on them, and that the act of putting down claim stakes made no difference at all.

Beret's thoughts continued to spin; the web had grown so dreadful to look at that she longed to cast it aside, but lacked the power. . . . He has done it, he has done it!—the thoughts spun on. . . . Here we are sitting on another man's land, and Per Hansa intends to stay! . . . He has destroyed another man's landmarks. . . . Oh, my God! . . .

In a certain sense, however, his guilt began to appear less fatal in her eyes as she continued to look at it; surely there was enough land out here for everyone; whether they got this quarter or another made no difference. She could not understand why one should make a fuss over a thing like that. . . . But the dishonourableness of the act made her shrink back in disgust. . . . And now a new terror—the terror of consequences! Per Hansa, poor fellow, could not even speak the language. How would he ever defend himself, when the case came up?. . . The stories that she had heard, both in Norway and east in Fillmore, of how people in this wild country would ruthlessly take the matters of law and justice into their own hands, also crept into the web of her thoughts. Here he was, unable to give a satisfactory explanation, guilty before the law of one of the blackest crimes that it was possible for man to commit. . . . He was so hasty and quick-tempered, too, whenever things went wrong; and now he was in a mood which made people afraid to approach him. . . .

. . . Beret would look at her web until her whole body trembled and she had to reach out and grasp something to steady herself.

VI

Beret had now formed the habit of constantly watching the prairie; out in the open, she would fix her eyes on one point the sky line—and then, before she knew it, her gaze would ve swung around the whole compass; but it was ever, er the same. . . . Life it held not; a magic ring lay on the rizon, extending upward into the sky; within this circle living form could enter; it was like the chain inclosing e king's garden, that prevented it from bearing fruit. . . . ow could human beings continue to live here while that gic ring encompassed them? And those who were strong ough to break through were only being enticed still farther their destruction! . . .

They had been here four months now; to her it seemed e so many generations; in all this time they had seen no angers except the Indians—nor would they be likely to e any others. . . . Almost imperceptibly, her terror beuse of the stakes which her husband had burned had faded ay and disappeared. . . . They had probably belonged to e Indians, so it did not matter; he had become fast friends th them. . . .

People had never dwelt here, people would never come; ver could they find home in this vast, wind-swept void. . Yes, they were the only ones who had been bewitched o straying out here! . . . Thus it was with the erring sons men; they were lost before they knew it; they went astray thout being aware; only others could see them as they re. Some were saved, and returned from their wanders, changed into different people; others never came back. . God pity them: others never came back! . . .

At these times, a hopeless depression would take hold of ; she would look around at the circle of the sky line; ough it lay so far distant, it seemed threatening to draw and choke her. . . .

. . So she grew more taciturn, given to brooding ughts.

But then the unthinkable took place: some one from oute broke through the magic circle. . . .

t happened one evening. Ole had ridden the pony west the swamps; on the way home he noticed a large white ck moving along through the haze on the eastern horizon.

It did not seem so very far away; as he watched it came creeping closer; the boy was so startled that he could hear the beating of his own heart; he had to investigate this thing. The pony was fleet-footed; he had plenty of time to make a turn to the eastward; he rode directly toward the speck. When he had satisfied himself that west-movers were coming—the wagons indicated that—he turned toward home and urged the pony till his body lay flat to the ground. On the way in he stopped at Tönseten's with the news, then at Hans Olsa's; hastening on to his own house, he shouted loudly for them to come out and look . . . come out in a hurry!

. . . What a strange feeling it gave them! . . . Two horses in front of a wagon; the wagon covered, just like their own! . . . And like their own, it came slowly creeping out of the eastern haze; like them, these folks were steering for Sunset Land. . . . Alas! thought Beret, some one else has been led astray!

The wagon held on toward Tönseten's; it reached his place and halted. The incident was so unusual and startling that all in the little settlement forgot their good manners and rushed pell-mell over to Tönseten's. Even Beret could not keep away; she put on a clean apron, took And-Ongen by the hand, and joined the others. . . . The whole colony, young and old, were gathered there when she arrived—everyone except Per Hansa. . . . He came up silently at last, carrying a heavy stick.

The company consisted of four men; they were from Iowa. . . . No, they didn't intend to stop here; they were bound for a place about seventy miles to the southwest; the land was nearly all taken up around here, they had been told. . . . Tönseten and the Solum boys were conversing with them in English; Hans Olsa, together with the women and children, stood respectfully listening; as for Per Hansa, he was all eyes and ears, scrutinizing the four visitors from head to foot, trying to make out what they were saying. . . . His grip on the stick relaxed; hadn't he understood that they were going seventy miles farther? . . .

At last he grew impatient, because he was unable to follow e conversation as well as he wished; he grasped Tönseten the arm and pinched it so hard that he turned around grily; but the next second he was talking again.

"What sort of people are they?"

"Germans. . . . Don't bother me now!"

"You must tell them not to stop. . . . We want only rwegians here, you know!"

But Tönseten had no time now to waste words on Per nsa; that could be attended to in due season; he was deep a long discussion with the strangers, all about the prospects the future out here.

These four unexpected evening arrivals stayed with them rnight, and went on their way the next morning; the ring Creek settlers had never seen them before; they uld perhaps never see them again; but they all felt that s was the greatest event which had yet happened in the tlement. . . . Seventy miles farther into the evening glow se fellows were going—seventy long miles! Then this ce would no longer be life's last outpost! . . . Folks were ning, were passing on . . . folks who intended to build mes! . . .

. . A living bulwark was springing up between them and endless desolation! . . .

Before the Germans left in the morning they came to amine Per Hansa's house; Tönseten had told them of one his neighbours who had built a dwelling and stable under e roof; they thought it would be well worth the trouble go and look at a structure of that kind; they themselves re just beginning, and needed ideas. While they were re Per Hansa got a chance to sell them some potatoes l vegetables, to the amount of two dollars and seventy- e cents; this was the first produce to be sold out of the tlement on Spring Creek. . . . Tönseten didn't take it dly at all; he could have done as much himself; but who uld ever have thought of such a thing? . . . He certainly tches his chances, that fellow Per Hansa!

VII

The strangers finally managed to make a start late that forenoon; the Spring Creek folks stood watching the wagon as it grew smaller and smaller, until it was only a dot on the horizon, receding farther and farther under the brow of the heavens; at last it disappeared—but whether into the earth or into the sky, no one could tell. . . .

This visit affected each one differently, according to his own traits and peculiarities; but with all it was a new incentive to let their eyes scan the prairie. They had always done this, of course; but more often it had been with the object of straightening their tired backs for a moment, than to seek for actual traces of wandering fellow beings. . . . The visit had encouraged them all, but Tönseten and his wife were especially firm and optimistic in their faith; from now on Syvert always spoke of the future with fervent conviction, and Kjersti went about listening to him in a glow of silent but none the less ardent devotion. The Solum boys also had little doubt of the omen—this wagon was only the forerunner of more to come! The next in order of enthusiasm was Sörine, to whom faith imparted a glad calmness. Hans Olsa let every day be sufficient unto itself, enjoyed the confident spirits of the others, and set himself every day to accomplish something needful; he was not a fast worker, but got things done with a peculiar sureness of purpose and steadiness of gait; it did not seem of great importance to him how many new people came; the important thing was how they got along—the folks who were here already.

Per Hansa was even louder in his optimism than Tönseten. Now there were settlers to both the east and the southwest of them; far away to the northeast, too, folks were known to have taken up land; the time wasn't far distant when they would have near neighbours all around. There were moments, even, when he felt confident that he would live to see the day when most of the land of the prairie would be taken up; in such moods, there was something fascinating ut him; bright emanations of creative force seemed to e out of his square, stocky figure; his whole form be- ae beautiful, the lines of his face soft and delicate; when- r he spoke a tone of deep joy rang in his words. . . . these moods did not last; when there came a pause in fairy tale, Per Hansa fell silent about the future, worked nsely and grew cross and irritable; at such times he was ard man to deal with.

o Beret the visit had seemed nothing but a brief interrup- to the endless solitude. The facts were unchangeable— as useless to juggle with them, or delude oneself; nothing an eternal, unbroken wilderness encompassed them round ut, extending boundlessly in every direction; that these plains, so like infinity, should ever be peopled and led, would be a greater miracle than for dead men to up and walk! . . .

t happened about a week later, that another caravan came ping slowly out of the evening. This was a great proces- —six teams of horses, with the same number of wagons. . Darkness was already falling when they were sighted.

Hansa's boys wanted to start out at once, and were rrelling over who should ride to meet the strangers; but father suddenly came and told them both to stay at home; poke in such a determined voice that they understood it uld be useless to mention the matter again. . . . They uldn't be running out to meet every stranger, he went as though they had never seen people before! Time ugh to speak with these newcomers to-morrow. He was g over now to find out if they needed any potatoes. . He suited the action to the word.

t Hans Olsa's house the caravan had not yet been sighted; Hansa saw a light in the window as he passed. Tönseten standing outside when he arrived there; the caravan lay e distance off to the southward, steering too far west etch the settlement.

"You're going to have visitors," Per Hansa greeted his hbour.

"It looks that way!" chuckled Tönseten. . . . "Though I'm afraid they're heading a little too far west."

They stood gazing at the train of wagons, now less than a hundred yards away; through the dusk they could just make out the forms of the men driving. Kjersti stood behind them in the door, laughing to herself and wondering how she could put them all up for the night. . . . Oh, well, if it couldn't be arranged here, Per Hansa would have to take some of them home to his place.

. . . "I wonder what kind of people they are?" Tönseten mused. . . . "Are they going to pass right by an open door?"

"That's just what they're doing!" said Per Hansa, curtly, fearing that now the trolls were upon them.

"But surely they can see us?"

"They ought to, if they have eyes!"

The caravan had now drawn abreast of them to the southwest; it was so near that they could hear the panting of the horses; then the foremost wagon swung off a trifle and took a more westerly course; they evidently had no intention of camping here for the night.

"You'd better go over and talk to them, Syvert," said Kjersti. . . . "We'll make room for them somehow."

Tönseten gazed at them open-mouthed; tears of disappointment stood in his eyes. . . . "That's a fine way to act!" he spluttered. . . . "Hadn't we better go over and invite them?"

Per Hansa's eyes flashed daggers; his face lighted up with irresistible forcefulness. . . . "We won't bother about that just yet. . . . They might be high-toned, you know—heading for Hans Olsa's place, or mine!"

The train moved slowly on toward the northwest, until it was on the line between Hans Olsa's and Tönseten's; there the wagons stopped and the horses were unhitched; the newcomers had evidently decided to pitch their camp for the night.

. . . "It's the strangest thing I ever saw!" said Tönseten as if speaking to himself. "Can you imagine anyone coming o a neighbourhood where the houses are standing around thick as fleas on a dog's back, and not even wanting to k to the folks who live in 'em? . . . I call it a damned rage! What's the matter—are they afraid of us?"

"It doesn't seem as if they can really be civilized people!" in Kjersti.

"Most likely they've got some nice-looking girls aboard, I are afraid the place is full of knock-about single men!" r Hansa explained, calmly.

The three puzzled folks stood there watching and wonder- ; through the deepening dusk they couldn't make out rly what the strangers were doing. . . . Apparently they re building a fire down on the slope; a glare of flames ermittently rose and spread, waned and reappeared; it med to flit back and forth on the ground.

"Do you know what, Syvert?" Per Hansa suggested, mis- evously. . . . "Since those fellows won't come and talk us, we'd better take a trip over and visit them. We might n talk them into buying some potatoes—eh? We must ch our chances, you know." . . . He was anxious to get a k at them.

Tönseten could see no particular objection, especially since Hansa had an errand with them; but it did seem rather miliating to go and shake hands with folks who had re- ed to say "hullo" to them. . . . But after a moment they ted on their way.

They had walked only a few steps, however, when he drew with a jerk. "Let's go over to Hans Olsa's and take him ng; he'd like to shake hands with them too, you know."

—Not at all—certainly not!—was Per Hansa's decisive ly. Hans Olsa knew no more English than he did; and as devilish awkward to stand around and stare strangers he face, without knowing a word they said; he himself ld never have thought of going if it hadn't been that ought to make use of the opportunity to sell some toes! . . .

They went on a few steps farther, and then Tönseten stopped again; his courage was dripping away. . . . Suppose they were Scandinavians?

—What nonsense! . . . Per Hansa kept right on walking. Neither Swedes nor Danes behaved in that boorish fashion; anyway, they probably had all gone to bed at Hans Olsa's; they always turned in early there.

The fire burned lustily over on the prairie; four women went to and fro placing dishes of food on a big green cloth spread on the ground; some of the men had already gathered around it; others were occupied with the wagons. . . . As they drew near, Per Hansa counted ten men in all; he scrutinized their faces closely, one by one; but he found none that he liked. . . . Tönseten went briskly up to the fire and greeted those who were sitting around; Per Hansa did likewise. The strangers plainly sneered at their greeting; they said something among themselves which Per Hansa did not understand. . . .

—Where did these men come from? Tönseten asked boldly.

—From down in Iowa.

—Were they going far west?

—No!

This much Per Hansa was able to follow; but here he began to lose the meaning; the men spoke English too fast, and Tönseten wasn't much better; not that it made any difference, however; Per Hansa knew all that he needed to know. . . . They had come at last! . . . Of the conversation that followed he only understood that it was about land and that the men were making sport with Tönseten, who had grown angry and now spoke still faster. . . . It was unbelievable how fast Syvert could rattle off the English! . . . The strangers' mockery was getting rather ugly now; he could tell it by the sound of their laughter. . . . Damn it all, to think that he couldn't talk to them!

"Huh!" exclaimed Tönseten, turning suddenly to his neighbour . . . "Can you imagine what they are saying? . . . They . . . they insist that both my quarter and Hans Olsa's belong to them!"

"You don't say! . . . What about mine?"

But Tönseten paid no further attention to him; he was off ain in his squabble with the Irishmen, and growing more d more excited with every word. . . . It struck Per Hansa at if Syvert didn't stop a moment to catch his breath, was either going to explode, or else he would burst into rs; he grasped his arm firmly.

"What do they say, Syvert?"

"They say they've taken up all the land between the eek and the swamps over to the westward, a strip two arter-sections wide. . . . And they talk rougher and wilder an anything I ever heard; they're threatening murder, and e, and state's prison!"

"Do they say when they were here?"

"Last summer, and late in the fall, and early this spring, !"

"What cultivation have they done to meet the law?" . . . r Hansa spoke calmly and thoughtfully.

"They claim that they've been granted exemption from government because they were soldiers in the Civil War! . Isn't that the devil's own luck?"

"Ask to see their papers."

"They say they've got the papers. They'll produce them the morning, all right!"

"Then we might as well go home and get to bed!" said r Hansa, calmly. . . . "But be sure to ask whether they d any potatoes!" he added with a flash of roguishness.

But Tönseten had not heard; he was once more absorbed wrangling. The men about the fire had now all risen; se who were working at the wagons had joined them; a se circle had formed around the pair. Per Hansa watched silence, his pipe hanging unlighted from one corner of his uth; when his eyes caught those of one of the strangers held on some time before letting go.

"Well," he put in, dryly, as Tönseten stopped to catch his ath, "don't they want to buy any potatoes?" . . .

"Potatoes!" cried Tönseten. . . . "You ought to hear how savagely they talk! They say they don't need to show any papers to thieves and claim jumpers like us!"

"All right. . . . Have they got their stakes down here too?"

"On both quarters, they say!" . . .

Per Hansa saw that if Tönseten kept on much longer, he would go to pieces entirely; that would be rather embarrassing for both of them.

"Come on, Syvert, let's go home to bed. . . . It looks as though we couldn't make a deal in potatoes, anyway!"

At that he calmly began to elbow his way out of the circle. Tönseten saw him going, grew alarmed, and hurried after. Some one of the Irish must have tripped him; he stumbled and nearly lost his balance; this made them all laugh—but one man in particular roared with glee; his jeering voice had an offensive, deliberately insulting tone.

. . . Per Hansa wheeled suddenly and stood glaring at them; Tönseten glanced at him and grew frightened in earnest.

. . . "Come on!" he cried with chattering teeth, and took to his heels.

. . . "Hell, Syvert—wait a minute!"

Per Hansa kept searching the crowd until he found the face from which that insolent jeering came; a grim, cold sneer had spread over his own. At last he located the fellow, close at hand; he held his clenched fist under the man's nose, drew his head well down between his shoulders in order to get more power, and said in a dry, rasping voice, in the broadest Nordland dialect:

"Now, by God! you'd better shut up your mouth or I'll wipe that grin off your face for you!"

His eyes actually seemed to scorch the man; then he let up, straightened his shoulders, and glanced around at the crowd.

. . . Apparently no one was anxious to have anything to do with him; the jeering laughter died away. Then he let his gaze travel slowly back to the first man; the fellow had sense enough not to laugh any more. . . . And so ce he couldn't talk to them, there was nothing left for Hansa to do but go away. . . .

)ff in the dark he could hear a faint calling; by the nd of Tönseten's voice he was not far from tears now.

I'll take all our papers along to-morrow and show them—
/'ll see what's what!" he blubbered, as Per Hansa came . . . "You shouldn't be so hasty! Suppose they had all en upon us! . . . Good heavens! . . ."

Well, you can try your papers on them, if you want . . . But let me tell you this, my good Syvert: with these ple you can't use either the 'Catechism' or the 'Epitome'; / don't live according to the Scriptures!" . . .

Tönseten drew a long and heavy sigh. . . . "My God! at troubles a man may fall into! . . . It makes me shudder hink how wild they talked!"

When they parted it was agreed that all the menfolk should et early next morning, to counsel together as to what st be done. Per Hansa was to notify Hans Olsa and the um boys, and bring all three over to Tönseten's.

Don't breathe a word to Kjersti about how things are!" Hansa warned him. . . . "If the women ever get hold his, they'll die of fright! . . . We'll find a way out some-/—I tell you we will!"

VIII

As he walked homeward Per Hansa was a totally different n from the one who had gone over to Tönseten's a ple of hours before. Then he had carried a heavy burden worry and care; but now he walked with a lightsome, yant step, very well pleased with the turn events had en. His mood lightened and brightened as he figured gs out and added up the total. The problem came out right. . . . These fellows were nothing but a pack of undrels; the thought was so comforting to him that he like thanking the Lord. They had not filed their claims ll; he doubted very much if they were soldiers; if they had a clear case, they would have produced their papers at once. . . . Why, one only needed to look at their faces! Next moment he began to whistle, striking up the merry tune of an old polka. It wasn't so much because they would not be able to chase him away that he was glad; but because now he was once more a guiltless man! He felt so light-hearted and free again that he could have leaped up and soared through the air. . . . How fine life was, after all! He didn't know, just at present, exactly how he was to snatch his neighbours out of the grip of the trolls; but matters would straighten themselves out somehow; the magic sword would be there when he needed it! . . .

When he got home the boys were sitting up in bed, undressed and waiting for him; Beret stood by the stove, roasting a substitute for coffee which she made from potatoes; the room was filled with smoke and the door stood open. She looked at him in the faint glimmer from the lamp; his face bore nothing but signs of good, she saw; then no danger hung over them! Perhaps a few more settlers would arrive as the years passed. . . . The boys were asking questions both together in a steady stream; now and then she quietly slipped in a question of her own; but the flood of talk from the bed was so torrential that she could scarcely be heard. The father had to go over and give them a box on two on the ears, to quiet them down; but it turned into skylarking instead of chastising, with screams of laughter and a new flood of questions; they had forgotten their anger at not being allowed to go with him! . . . The wife asked and the boys asked over and over again: what nationality the newcomers belonged to, how many they were, and whether they were going to settle here; how many horses they had, how many cattle; whether they had any women; what they had brought in their wagons; if they had bargained for many potatoes; and the like. It seemed as if their curiosity could never be satisfied. . . . But the father was in such a good humour that he had a bantering answer for everything, no matter what silly questions they asked; he entered wholeheartedly into the hilarity of the boys, till he too was talking only nonsense. . . . These folks were all Irish, he explained women were terrible trolls, with noses as long as rake les. . . . Settle here? Not they! No, they were going o the end of the world, and a long way farther. They much, much uglier than the Indians, and spoke so ly fast that it sounded like this. . . . He hardly thought would be a chance to sell any potatoes; troll women he flesh of Christian men, instead of potatoes—didn't know that? Just the same, he was going to take a le of sacks along to-morrow, to see whether he couldn't t them away from their regular fare. . . . His banter so boisterous at last that Beret was half-frightened; is voice sounded so bright and cheerful, and had such arm, infectious gladness running through it, that she l not find it in her heart to reprove him. When they to bed later in the evening he put his arm lovingly nd her and fell asleep almost immediately. . . . She sure there could be no danger this time.

t before she was awake, and long before the faintest of day shone into the room, Per Hansa was up again;
te some cold porridge left from the night before, put leed into his pocket, and went over to the Solum boys'
; there he roused them, and waited till they had eaten outhful or two; then all three continued on to Hans
's.

they walked along Per Hansa reviewed the situation hem; with the help of their questions, he gradually exed his plan:

t's this way, boys: there's no danger for any of us three;
neighbours are the ones who are in trouble and stand eed of help; but as for that, you realize as well as I do we wouldn't have a very pleasant future ahead of us,
r, if they were chased away from here. . . . Now, re a pretty good talker, Henry, and had better be spokes-for the rest of us; Tönseten gets excited so easily you
; then you, Sam, must translate for Hans Olsa and n order that we may follow what's going on. Those felmust be made to show their papers; be sure to look ly at dates and signatures and that sort of thing, to satisfy yourself that they haven't been tampered with. . . After that, we want to know if they have planted stake here, and where they are! Just tell them straight from th shoulder, in good plain English, that here we are, and her we intend to stay until some one kicks us out. . . . Put a the guts into it that you can!"

The Solum boys took a sensible view of the whole matter to Henry it seemed just an amusing interruption to thei loneliness; the idea of chasing people away from a plac that was nearly destitute of human beings already, seeme comical. . . . Even Sam was brave to-day; these were whit folks, with whom one could talk and reason; that wasn so dangerous! . . .

Per Hansa told them to keep on to Tönseten's; he an Hans Olsa would come as soon as they could.

IX

Everything about Hans Olsa was of unusual dimensions his great body made strangers stop and look; it loomed u like a mountain when he rose to his full height; his strengt was in proportion to his bulk; things that he took hold o often got crushed in his grip. New ideas found their wa behind that big forehead with great difficulty; he had to loo at a thought for some time before he could comprehend it on the other hand, it invariably held true that when an ide had once become well lodged in there, it would remain clea and unchanged forever. His mind worked in the same wa as his body; he was slow to grasp, but rarely dropped any thing after he had picked it up; on this account he alway found it difficult to turn back, once he had chosen his path Right and wrong were eternal verities with him, which coul not be changed and must not be tampered with; right wa right, and wrong was wrong; thus it had always been, an thus it must remain as long as the world should stand.

When Per Hansa entered his neighbour's house that morn ing, he found himself immediately embarrassed; both hus band and wife were up, and he did not care to speak of thei dicament while Sörine was listening; the women ought be kept out of this! Time was pressing, however, and couldn't waste it in lengthy explanations; besides, Hans a and his wife had already discovered the camp to the ttward and were planning to go over and visit the stran-s, with Tönseten as an interpreter. . . . Per Hansa lly knew which way to turn; he looked at Sörine's face, again, as so often before, was impressed by the goodness intelligence in it; then he made up his mind and related kly the whole experience which had befallen him and seten the night before.

. . . "Now, Sörrina, I know you are a sensible woman will keep your mouth shut," he added, quickly, when he through. "Beret doesn't know anything about this, her does Kjersti; there's no need of alarming folks who in a bad way already. . . . Not that we need to worry this business; I'm sure they'll take it peaceably when we w them our papers. . . . Now we must hurry. Get your l, Hans Olsa!"

ut it was a sheer impossibility for Hans Olsa to hurry matter of this kind; he had to ask about it over and over n. Facts were facts, which in this case were clear beyond stioning: He himself had gone to the land office in per-; Tönseten had put his finger on precisely this quarter-ion on the map, and had asked in Hans Olsa's name if uld be taken up; there had been nothing in the way, not slightest claim; it was so stated in the document; and ad moved directly on to his land and had done everything the law prescribed. If anything was wrong, the govern-t would have to clear it up; but how could anything ibly be wrong? . . .

Why, certainly," said Per Hansa, with shrewd common e. . . . "The government is all right in its place—one questions that! But out here this morning, the ernment is a little too far away . . . that's where the ble comes in."

You don't mean that they actually intend to kick us out?" demanded Hans Olsa in an astonished voice, unconsciously stretching his huge frame.

"That's just what they intend to do, as I understand them. . . . We'll have to show them where we stand, in black and white!" . . . Per Hansa looked at the woman.

"You don't say, Per Hansa! Are there . . . are there many of them?"

"I counted ten men and four women; I believe that's all there are." . . . The ghost of a smile passed over Per Hansa's face.

Hans Olsa sat in silence for a while, with the deed folded up in his hand: then he smoothed it out again and looked at it closely. The greater part of it was unintelligible to him, but he understood all the essentials: the date, the description of the land, the signature of the government, and his own. All this was correct in every way; and up to this very minute he had kept his part of the contract to the letter of the law. He handed the paper to Per Hansa, and said in a ponderous voice:

"Do you see anything wrong there?"

Per Hansa was growing impatient; here they sat, wasting precious time; his laugh had a hard, short ring:

"No! It isn't you who are wrong in this case, you see; it's those devils who have squatted here on your land!"

"Do they look like peaceable folks?" asked Sörine, calmly.

"One would suppose so . . . they have their women along!"

Hans Olsa spoke slowly: "We'd better go over and talk to them."

"That's the idea! . . . Just put the deed in your pocket, and let's get started!"

X

Tönseten and the Solum boys were waiting impatiently when the others arrived. Later on, Tönseten let it out that he had told his wife the whole story as soon as he had come home the night before; neither of them had slept a wink all

nt. He was nervous and jumpy this morning, and wanted tart out immediately.

"No, this won't do," said Per Hansa, firmly. "We mustn't without a plan. How are we going to tackle the business en we get there?"

"We've got to drive them away from here!" cried Tönn, excitedly.

"Fine! . . . But the question is: How are we going about

"We've got to convince them that we are here with the sanction of law and justice," said Hans Olsa, solemnly.

"You're damned right we must!" flashed Per Hansa. . . . ave you got your paper, Syvert?"

—No, Tönseten had thought of bringing the deed with , but he feared it would be too risky. . . . "They might e it away from me, and then I'd be in a devil of a hole!" nseten's face was so agitated that it was a pity to look at. ut Per Hansa now took charge in a determined manner. . "Go in and get that deed immediately, Syvert, so that can get going! . . . Don't worry—we'll see to it that no molests you!"

nd so they started. On the way over, Per Hansa exmed the tactics they were to follow; Henry Solum and nseten should be the spokesmen, Sam the interpreter; Hansa took pains to impress upon Sam how important as that he translate correctly and rapidly, so that he and ns Olsa could keep abreast of proceedings. . . . "I think rill be best for you, Henry, to cut loose; then you, Syvert, put in your oar when you think it's needed. But don't much; and for Heaven's sake, be careful not to talk too ; you know how quickly you get short-winded. Rember we have the whole day ahead of us!"

Tönseten was highly displeased with this plan of Per nsa's, but he lacked the strength to protest; matters had hed such a bad pass already that they could hardly get se. . . .

t was plainly evident that the strangers had not overslept mselves that morning; although the hour was still very early—full daylight had barely come—all hands were busily at work when the five settlers reached the camp. Two of the wagons had already been unloaded; a few of the men were beginning to open up the others, while the rest of the crew were putting up a large tent.

Per Hansa and Henry Solum walked ahead; then came Hans Olsa and Sam; Tönseten, who at first had trotted along with the van, had now quietly dropped back to the rear.

"Ah-ha!" observed Per Hansa to his companions. "They're planning to settle here, it seems! . . . Now. first you must ask to see their papers; and then the stakes—insist on the stakes! Talk pleasantly to begin with . . . but it won't do any harm to have a little sport with them, you know. If they get ugly, just tease them on awhile."

Their friendly greetings were returned in a churlish fashion; the strangers didn't seem anxious for company; each man went about his task without paying the slightest attention to the visitors.

—What were they doing here? Henry demanded.—This quarter had been taken up long ago.

—Indeed? Two of the men stopped their work and entered the conversation.

—Yes, the man who owned the land was standing right there—Henry pointed to Hans Olsa.—That fellow; he had his papers along, too; and now they must show their papers! If the land office had granted the same quarter-section to two different men, a bad mistake had been made, but it could easily be cleared up.

—Well, so they wanted to see the papers—was that the idea? Had they brought their spectacles? A roar of laughter from the others greeted this sally; but the man who had spoken wasn't exactly laughing—he held his head tilted on one side, his whole face screwed into an ugly leer. . . . Sam translated as accurately as he could.

—Yes, Henry continued in a firmer and more imperative tone, they had come to see both their papers and their stakes! Furthermore, there was a court in Sioux Falls to settle such matters. They had been living here all summer, breaking l planting, and hadn't the least thought of moving away. . Per Hansa sensed by the tone of Henry's voice that he s speaking well.

"That's right, Henry. . . . Give 'em hell!"

The man who had spoken with such an evil look a moment ore, now threw down his sledge hammer and came up them.

—All right, boys! Since they wouldn't take his word for he'd soon show them in black and white! The papers l been packed away somewhere and couldn't be found t now. They would have to wait awhile to look at them; he would show them the stakes! They'd better come ht along with him now; he was in a devil of a hurry; he l both plowing and building to do before the snow flew.

The stranger began to walk rapidly westward; Per Hansa s right at his heels; as they hurried on, he breathed a yer that the grass might have sprung up freshly where he l done that little piece of work! . . .

The man seemed very certain about his direction. As they proached Hans Olsa's southwest corner, he slackened pace and began pushing the grass aside with his foot; Hansa had in the meanwhile discovered with his eyes exact spot where the stake had stood. He all but ghed aloud; indeed, the rain and the sun of the good Lord l done their work well; not a blade of grass seemed dis-ced, not a broken stalk could be seen! . . . Besides, the n was mistaken about the location of the spot; he had ne too far to the north and west before he got down on his es to scan the ground. He did a thorough job, however; lked a few steps, knelt and examined the ground round out; rose, went forward a little distance, got down on his es again; but all the while he was moving farther and ther away from the right spot. . . . Per Hansa could rdly restrain himself; quiet chuckles were beginning to e in his throat; but he realized the danger in time, and ghed them away.

The man searched and searched, back and forth, around l around; at first he went at it hastily, as if finding the stake were the easiest thing in the world; after a while he looked more slowly and cautiously. . . . He was swearing like a trooper now; Per Hansa knew enough English to understand most of it; he didn't wonder that the fellow felt moved to say a little something, under the circumstances. . . .

At last the searcher got up and called loudly to the others. . . . A man came over from the camp—a small man with reddish hair and a face as freckled as a moor dotted with heather. They began to talk together in low tones, from time to time casting angry glances at Hans Olsa; they searched the whole region again, but found no trace of what they were looking for.

Hans Olsa made strenuous efforts to take in what was happening; his big, rough-hewn face, with the rugged features that ordinarily were the picture of trust and honesty, had become strange to behold. He gazed at these two men, hurrying here and there, trying to prove that he was a scoundrel; he heard what Sam managed to translate of their complimentary remarks about him; and it all seemed to awaken a new and ominous force behind that impassive countenance; his big childlike eyes blazed with astonishment, occasionally emitting sharp flashes; he trembled slightly all over, though he was not aware of it.

Suddenly the two men abandoned the search, exchanged a few heated remarks, turned away, and went back to the camp without saying another word. . . . The five settlers followed.

"If they have no better luck with the papers," said Per Hansa, "things don't look very bright for them!"

When the five reached the camp all ten of the strangers stood in a group, talking angrily together. The women were nowhere in sight; as the Nordlanders came up a burly, red-faced man stepped out from the group, evidently their leader. . . . "God be with you, Henry. . . . Stand right up to him and talk him down!" Per Hansa whispered to the Solum boy. . . . It was clearly evident from the man's face that a storm was brewing; the fact that the big Irishman rried a sledge hammer in his hand also attracted Per nsa's attention.

"Where are the men who claim to have taken up this d?" he snapped at them.

—Right there, those two!—Henry pointed to Tönseten l Hans Olsa.—That one—Tönseten—owned the quarter the south; this one—Hans Olsa—the one they now stood

The Irishman singled out Hans Olsa and looked him up l down.

—What was the matter with that fellow—was he deaf l dumb? He couldn't seem to get his mouth open! The n fingered his sledge hammer, and glared around at Henry if he would swallow him up.

—Oh no, Hans Olsa had his faculties, all right! He just ldn't talk English.

Sam was translating all this as best he could.

—Well, he could tell this dirty son-of-a- —— that he was hief and a blackguard who had destroyed another man's dmarks!

Sam translated rapidly, trembling with fear.

The Irishman came closer.

—If the whole damned gang of sneaking swine didn't off their land right away, he'd give them something to rt with!—Perhaps they'd understand that language bet- !—The man swung his sledge hammer.

"Look out, now!" shouted Per Hansa. "Here the trouble rts!" . . .

And so it did, only much faster than he or any of the ers had anticipated. When Hans Olsa saw the Irishman m up before him in that threatening attitude, he stared him blankly, and stood for a moment as if rooted to ground. Then, all of a sudden, the upper part of his ly seemed to stretch; he stepped aside to evade the on- ught . . . his left fist shot out and struck the man below ear. There was a crashing sound; with a loud groan man sank in a heap and lay perfectly still.

"Look out there, Henry!" cried Per Hansa. . . . "See that you get your man, and I'll get mine! . . . Wait a minute!"

The crowd had drawn back in front of one of the empty wagons; they stood as if dazed. Hans Olsa stared at them wildly, took a step forward, and stumbled over the heap on the ground. Regaining his balance, he stopped, bent over, and plunged both hands into the inert heap of flesh; the next instant he lifted it high in the air and flung it bodily over the heads of the crowd, where it crashed into the wagon standing behind. The wagon shook violently at the impact. . . . At the same moment the group scattered and took to their heels southward across the prairie. From one of the wagons, still covered by its canvas, sounded a scream of terror; four women came tumbling out and followed after the men.

Hans Olsa stood motionless, quivering in every muscle; he seemed like a man half stunned.

Per Hansa jumped to his side and slapped him on the shoulder:

"Goodness! Hans Olsa, that was beautiful! I don't believe there's another man in the whole country who could do such a thing! . . . Now I think we can safely go home; those folks aren't likely to start any more arguments about land!"

Hans Olsa was slowly regaining his natural poise; he stroked his face and sighed deeply, like one recovering from an attack of delirium.

"I'm afraid I handled him pretty roughly; you'd better go and look at him, Per Hansa."

Per Hansa laughed confidently. . . . "No, leave him alone; just do as I say, now! We're going straight home, the whole lot of us. . . . Later in the day I'll take a little trip of my own out westward!"

They did as he bade them—though Tönseten could not be found anywhere; he had vanished from the scene long before. In the latter part of the afternoon Per Hansa returned to the camp of the Irish, to find out what they were doing and how they were getting along; he took Store-Hans with n as interpreter. . . . He found the whole camp moved to of the two quarter-sections lying west of Tönseten's . Hans Olsa's land.

Per Hansa made frequent visits to them during the next days; before the third day was over, he had sold them re than ten dollars' worth of potatoes; he felt that he struck up a profitable business.

The Irish finally settled on these two quarters west of m. They returned east to Iowa just before the snow in the fall; but early the following spring they came k with a large company, and started their permanent set- ment.

XI

On the morning when the men had gone out to parley h the Irish, Kjersti was left all alone in the house. She gloomy and depressed; there had been little or no sleep either of them during the night; Syvert had tossed to and in bed, telling and retelling the same unhappy story— the terrible folks who had come, of what they proposed do, and of the dreary future that awaited him and Hans sa, who would now be forced to start everything anew. . Perhaps they had better just move east again, and done with it! He had lain twisting and turning as he moaned their fate, his mood steadily growing gloomier l gloomier. . . . This had kept up so long that it had ven her nearly distracted; at last she had grown tired of everlasting whimpering and had told him so in plain rds. As yet, she pointed out, no one in the settlement had t either life or limb; their papers were all correct, law and tice ruled the land, and five strong men were here on nd to look after things . . . four, at any rate! And at worst, these were white people, thank the Lord! . . . All this and more she had said to Syvert; every word of had been well meant and fully considered. But he had own angry and had accused her of not having a particle of common sense; then one word had led to another. When the quarrel had finally worn itself out they had found themselves at opposite ends of the earth, though lying side by side in the same bed.

It was lonesome after the men had left that morning; Kjersti kept the coffeepot on the stove, and laid on a couple of fresh sticks of wood; he would be sure to look in for a drop when he came back! . . . Then she put on Syvert's old hat and went over to see Beret; she wanted to find out what Per Hansa had told her when he came home the night before.

She got little information or comfort there, however. . . . First she recounted most of what Tönseten had let out to her—that people had arrived who claimed to own Hans Olsa's land, as well as his own; that these people wouldn't listen to reason, so in all probability they would have to seek the aid of the law. . . . Hadn't Per Hansa told her what had happened?

The boys were eating their breakfast; Beret sat over by the stove, dressing the child; she made no answer to Kjersti; her face flushed but she did not look up.

Ole, however, laughingly began to repeat some of the crazy stories his father had told them the night before; Store-Hans remembered more of them, and helped his brother out when his memory failed; the boys were still highly excited, and kept on making such a noise and chatter that Kjersti threw up her hands, begging them for the Lord's sake to be quiet! . . .

Beret listened in a rigid, frozen silence; she let the boys say anything they wanted to, as if she lacked the strength to make them stop. . . . One thought seemed to possess her whole being: he had destroyed the stakes on other people's land—and now he was going to drive them away! . . . Good God! could this be possible? . . .

But at last the boys went so far that she had to interfere; they had begun to laugh together in a coarse, bold way, and use evil words. . . . How truly it is said, she thought, that the seed which is sown in secret bears fruit openly! . . .

h the child in her arms, she got up decisively, crossed room, and flashed out at the boys; she was very stern
, and scolded them harshly.

ll the while Kjersti had been growing more disturbed;
had to find consolation somewhere, and said, as if trying olster herself up:

This can't be anything to worry about! Why, we have given this quarter, and were the first to arrive here!"

What about Per Hansa's land?" asked Beret.

t seems they don't intend to claim that, according to t Syvert says. . . . I don't know why!"

Probably nothing can be done about it," said Beret, tly. "There is no telling who may have been wandering nd out here before we came. . . . Many may have been his aimless talk only irritated Kjersti.
."

should think they would keep all that straightened out
e people whose business it is to look after such things!
yvert weren't such a milksop of a man, he would have after the sheriff at once. . . . Folks are put in prison such deeds in America!"

eret was silent for a moment; she bent over the child, e a deep flush slowly covered her face; then she said
low voice:

he guilty will receive their punishment in the end!" . . .
soon as she had spoken, she got up and left the house ptly; outside, she put down the child, and stood like a e image looking westward; there she remained standing Kjersti came out.

see them coming now," she said, as the other appeared, that, Kjersti had to hurry off home, to get the break-for Syvert.

ut Tönseten had returned long before the others; he was ed when she came in; though the fall day was mild, he covered himself up with the heavy blanket. At first she ln't get a word out of him; she thought he must be ill, cially as he refused the coffee which she poured out for
. . . They can't possibly have done him an injury?

she thought. She began plying him with questions, and kept on until he finally admitted that they had come to blows out there on the prairie. His words were thickly interspersed with moans and groans; she began to fear in earnest that they had maltreated him; she felt him all over, and demanded to know where he had been hit.

. . . "Where did they hit me? . . . Why talk!" He would say no more on the subject. Then he gave a heavy sigh, adding: "It's terrible!" . . .

It was impossible for him to lie there long, however, without seeking an outlet; he had to confide in some one, or he would burst; so he finally told her his version of everything that had taken place that morning. Some of the things he had seen; the rest were phantoms of his own terror; he enlarged on certain points in his narrative very fully—especially the awful language which the Irish had used, and the effective replies which he had made to them. The general impression given by his story was that in all probability he would have brought the Irish around all right, if Per Hansa and Henry Solum hadn't stirred them up to fight; they had done just exactly the wrong things. And so a big ruffian had rushed forward with a sledge hammer; and Hans Olsa had gone into a mad rage and killed the man! From now on there would be nothing but war and bloodshed; so they might as well pack up and move right away! What a tragedy it was! . . .

Tönseten stayed safely in bed until late in the afternoon; then Kjersti came and told him that the strangers had gone. He got up immediately to see if it was true. . . . After that he seemed quite like himself again.

For a long time the Irish were the standing topic of discussion in the little settlement.

But whenever they were mentioned, Beret kept silent; she took no part in the joy and relief of the others, for there were certain circumstances connected with the affair which she couldn't get out of her mind; the longer she looked at them the uglier they appeared.

. . . He had destroyed the stakes; and worse than that, he d kept it secret from everyone . . . even from her!
. . . Shame had probably made him do that. . . . To be re, she knew now that the stakes had been put down un-wfully. But suppose it had been otherwise—would he ve done any different? . . . Was this the person in whom e had believed no evil could dwell? . . . Had it always en thus with him?
. . . Lives might have been lost; that, too, would have en his fault. . . . Nevertheless, he seemed to feel nothing t joy over the thing that he had done! . . .
. . . The explanation was plain; this desolation out here lled forth all that was evil in human nature. Land fully good as theirs extended round about them for thousands miles; but then these people had come, and had immeately wanted to seize what had already been taken, thinking at it would be an easy matter, since they were the stronger;
en her own husband had used deceit and force to drive em away; and now all was well! . . .
What would become of children who had to grow up in ch an atmosphere? . . . Their own children! . . . She tened to her boys gloating over the incidents of the recent counter—and her soul shuddered.
. . . No, she knew one who could not endure it forever
t here!
One afternoon a few days later the Irish came over to r Hansa's to buy more potatoes; they stayed for some ne and asked for information on various matters; the boys anslated the questions to their father as well as they could;
r Hansa thought the Irish were excellent folk!
At both Tönseten's and Hans Olsa's they had noticed the rangers come and go; in the evening they all went to Per ansa's to learn how the Irish had behaved.
. . . "Finest people in the world!" Per Hansa assured em, pacing the floor, uplifted by a surge of high spirits at somehow had to find an outlet. No sooner did he sit wn than he was up again; his sallies of humour had a shing quality that made them positively contagious. Tön-seten was in a continual gale of hilarity; Kjersti and Sörine, who sat on the big bed with their knitting, had to let their work drop at intervals to laugh at Syvert's and Per Hansa's extravagances. Beret had just laid the child in the other bed, and was sitting beside her on the edge; both boys were listening eagerly to the talk of their elders.

That evening Per Hansa told them all about the stakes; of how he had found them, of what he had thought, and of the way he had finally disposed of them. He related the story in a loud voice, with boisterous, care-free zest; he made it sound exactly like a fairy tale. . . . Many words of praise were bestowed on his wise action; Tönseten was especially effusive—there was a neighbour for you! As for Kjersti, she was moved almost to tears over such a man. What a difference from that spineless jellyfish of a husband of hers!

"I'll have to admit," said Hans Olsa, soberly, "that you played a risky game; and it was the hand of the Lord that kept you from telling. For if they had been able to show that their stakes had ever been on my land, we'd probably be building a new house now, somewhere out to the westward. All our work this summer would have been for others. . . . My thanks to you, Per Hansa!"

As Beret listened to the tale, she had to examine the narrator closely; surely this couldn't be Per Hansa! She remembered the morning when he had brought the stakes home; how he had chopped them up and put them furtively into the stove; and how his temper had taken hold of him at that time. . . . This was an entirely different person!

. . . So it had come to this, that he no longer felt ashamed of his sinful deed . . . and that respectable folks sat around, rejoicing with him over it! . . . She got up quickly, overcome by a sudden feeling of suffocation; involuntarily, without stopping to think, she said in a level, biting tone:

"Where I come from, it was always considered a shameful sin to destroy another man's landmarks. . . . But here, I see, people are proud of such doings!"

Her outburst shocked the others into silence—all but Per ansa. With a loud laugh he reached out clownishly, try-g to catch her in his arms.

"Oh, Beret, come on, now! . . . Just kick the dog that tes you—that's always the easiest way out, and the simplest, o!"

"I understand that perfectly well—though it makes poor hristianity. . . . But you were anything but confident, I ticed, that night when you stood over by the block, chop-ng up the stakes." She turned away from him and seemed speak to them all. . . . "Remember what the Book says: Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmarks! nd all the people shall say, Amen.' . . . words like these e used to heed. . . . In my opinion, we'd better take care st we all turn into beasts and savages out here!" . . .

Per Hansa laughed again with unnecessary loudness; but the midst of the laugh he stopped, a wave of anger sud-nly surging over him:

"We need a preacher, I hear. . . . Well, now we've got ne!"

To this Beret made no reply; instead, she left the room ruptly. Outside, it was pitch dark; she knew not where turn nor what she did; then she stumbled over the plow anding in the yard, and sank inertly on the plow beam. . . . As she sat there the storm within her slowly died away; eep melancholy came instead. . . . Long after the others ad gone she remained in the same position. Per Hansa ad not come out to look for her. . . . When she went in t last he had gone to bed; she could not make out if he was eeping, but she did not speak to him. The boys also had one to bed. . . .

During the days that followed, words were few and distant etween Per Hansa and his wife.

V. Facing the Great Desolation

I

IN the beginning of October a memorable event stirred the little Spring Creek settlement. This, the greatest happening of the year, chose an opportune moment for its arrival.

It was shortly after dinner. In the early morning Per Hansa, Hans Olsa, and Henry Solum had gone east to the Sioux River after wood; Tönseten was so sorely troubled by rheumatism that he hadn't been able to go along; anyway, he had wood enough on hand to last until after Christmas, and hauling would be easier on the snow. He did want some trees for planting; but as it was getting so late in the fall, with little likelihood of their taking root, he had given up the project.

Beret sat by the window at home; she was knitting some sort of a round affair—something so tiny that Store-Hans had asked her whether it was a new thumb for one of dad's mittens? . . . His mother had given him a queer smile, and answered, maybe it was. . . .

Beret had grown more sober as the autumn came, more locked up within herself; a heavy heart lay all the time in her bosom, but she tried her best to hide it from her husband. . . . Her knitting needles worked rapidly, with an involuntary rhythm; but her mind was not on her task; she barely glanced at the knitting as she emptied a needle; her gaze constantly wandered out-of-doors, flitting back and forth over the section of the plain that lay in her view. Her face wore that weary, abandoned expression which had now become habitual to it whenever she was left alone; a sense of such deep melancholy lay upon her, that her whole pearance seemed to reflect a never-ending struggle with reality. . . . Round after round was added to the knitting; r gaze continued to wander. . . .

. . . Without volition, it fastened on an object somewhere t there—and stayed. The knitting sank to her lap; she and gazed for a long time, motionless, self-absorbed. ep compassion was mingled with her melancholy, as in the art of one who would gladly give up life to save another om destruction.

. . . There must be many in that caravan! . . . She ned forward, trying to count the wagons. . . . No, she uld not make them out; the wagon train had already ssed the sky line and had come some distance toward her, tling into the blue-green stillness that lay over the inter- ning prairie.

. . . Some one else has gone astray! . . . Poor folks— or folks!

Suddenly a strong impulse took hold of her to do some- ing to save these people; she felt as if she ought to go and l them to turn back; yes, turn back—turn back—before ey had strayed any farther into destruction! . . .

She laid her knitting on the table, went outside, and stood the door to look at them more clearly. . . . Were there e wagons in the caravan? . . . That meant a good many ople.

. . . "Almighty God!" she sighed, "show mercy now to e children of men! Let not these folks be altogether lost the trackless wilderness. . . . For it is only I who have nned so sorely against Thee!"

Ole had gone to the woods with his father; Store-Hans that moment came riding up from the creek, where he d been to water the pony; he saw his mother standing tside the door in an attitude of constrained attention, and de rapidly toward her.

"What do you want, Mother? . . . What are you looking ?"

His words brought her out of her deep abstraction; she ok a few steps forward, then halted again. . . . What was the use of trying? She couldn't even speak the language of these people! . . . A feeling of unfathomable loneliness settled upon her; the cruelty of her fate suddenly took on fanciful proportions. . . . Here she was, an exile in an unknown desert; even when human beings passed, her own kind, she could not talk with them! How could the Lord have found it in His heart to smite a soul so heavily? . . . Beret put her hand up under her breast, where her own heart was beating, and pressed convulsively. . . .

"What is it, Mother—what is it?"

"Ride . . . ride over to them and see if you can't do something . . . help them out!"

The boy was suddenly all aglow with life; he wheeled the pony around, followed the direction of his mother's gaze, and immediately discovered the caravan.

"We must tell Syvert at once!" . . . Store-Hans turned his head, waiting for his mother's opinion.

. . . "Syvert?" . . . A shadow spread over her face. . . . What possible help could Syvert be to these poor people in their grievous need? She sighed in hopeless impotence. . . . "No, just ride over and ask them if you can do anything. . . . Tell them your father isn't at home."

Store-Hans couldn't remember when he had ever heard his mother talk so sensibly; he straightened himself in the saddle, sitting like a grown man; then he spoke to the pony, gave it a slap with the flat of his hand, and shouted to his mother: "Now I'm off! . . . You had better go and tell Syvert!"

But other eyes than hers had wandered across the prairie to the eastern sky line that day. All at once Sam came running to tell the news; he stopped only an instant, then continued on toward Tönseten's. Beret went into the house, roused And-Ongen, who was asleep on the bed, and took her along to tell Sörine; she, too, would be glad over a bit of news. . . . On the way over she prayed fervently to the Lord for these people, that they should not be lost in the blue-green endlessness. . . . She felt secretly glad because her husband was away from home.

II

Soon they were all gathered in front of Tönseten's house, ting with absorbed curiosity at the approaching train; had drawn so close now that each wagon could be clearly tinguished; Store-Hans was riding abreast of the fore- st team.

Tönseten fussed about excitedly, constantly thrusting his nds in and out of the waistband of his trousers; he was e, there, and everywhere, muttering incoherently all the ile. . . . Good Lord! he thought, were these more Irish s tough a gang as their last visitors? And Hans Olsa away at the Sioux River! . . . Here was a fine mess, eed!

Then Store-Hans came galloping in, and told a story so ange that all were lost in amazement.

"They are Norskies!" he shouted as he pulled up.

"What's that you say?" exclaimed Tönseten.

"Yes, Norskies, every single one, I tell you! A whole al of them—and they are coming right here! They talk rwegian, too."

"Are you crazy!" shouted Tönseten. . . . At once he an to assume a great dignity and authority; he ordered ersti indoors to put on the coffeepot, and sent the other men to help her. . . . "Don't you hear Hans say that they Norskies! Decent folks must get a decent reception!" And now he took Sam with him, and did like the patriarch old: he went out to meet the strangers, entreating them to er in under his humble roof.

A great event, indeed! The company consisted of five gons and the same number of horse teams; they were good ses, too—Tönseten could see that they were in fine condi- n. There were twenty men in the company, all Sognings l Vossings[1]—but mostly Sognings; the majority of them e married men; some had large families back east in nnesota; all were out seeking new homesteads; they in- ded to go back east in the fall, but would move west permanently as soon as spring came next year. They had passed through Sioux Falls and had been told at the land office of a settlement out here somewhere; so they had thought they'd better look the place over; but they were heading farther southwest, making for the James River or thereabouts. . . . Still, it was no small joy to these west-movers, to come across a cluster of sod huts inhabited by Norwegians out here on the endless prairie, and to find this hospitable, talkative man who was everywhere bustling about, trying to be of service to them.

[1] People from the districts of Sogn and Voss, in Norway.

They camped in the yard in front of Tönseten's house. When he discovered how many they were he said no more about coffee; but he brought them potatoes and other vegetables, and generously shared the evening milk with them. He would not hear of their sleeping in the open that night. . . . Stay outside, he shouted, when they had come to Norwegians who owned a new-built house? That would never, never do! . . . At turning-in time, he and Kjersti crawled into bed first; then the floor space was packed with as many of the strangers as it would accommodate, the rest seeking shelter in the barn.

Tönseten didn't get much rest that night; the worst of it was that he couldn't talk to Kjersti, at a time when he so sorely needed her counsel. . . . Good God! how could he sleep, with this tremendous responsibility suddenly thrust upon him? A whole settlement of Norwegians snoring right in front of his bed! . . . Fine people, excellent people, every one! And there would be still more in the company when they moved west next spring. . . . Hang the luck!—that Per Hansa should be far away on the Sioux River at this important moment! . . . If he could only persuade them to settle here, the future would be secure for both himself and his neighbours. . . . Yes, let him bring that about, and things would look so bright that he could turn over in bed and drop asleep every night with a thankful heart!

. . . He ought to start out right now, and get Per Hansa, who had such a wonderfully persuasive gift of tongue. But he couldn't discuss it with Kjersti; neither could he see way to get out of the house; men lay snoring side by e, from the edge of the bed clear over to the door! . . .

When all the strangers finally left the room in the morn-
. so that he and Kjersti could get out of bed, Tönseten as if he hadn't slept a wink all night; he realized full l that now he rose to confront his day of days.
He had no time to eat breakfast—he hardly noticed Kjer-when she called him; already he was deep in conversation
h the west-movers, telling them all about the land around ring Creek. . . . Surely they wouldn't leave without first king at it? . . . What? . . . No, that would be a great take, he'd better go along with them and show them und; he was just the man for the job, he dared say, for e he was thoroughly at home. Hadn't he been the orig-
. discoverer of the place, the first to select it, and the first build here and move in? He ought to have known what was about when he chose this particular spot—he who had n to Fox River, had visited Muskego and Koshkonong, . travelled all over Minnesota, and even through large ts of the Dakota Territory![1] . . . Tönseten gave them a . account of his expedition last fall to the western region ere they were bound; the land around Vermilion was te familiar to him; Yankton he had seen with his own
s. At this point he spun into the narrative a little yarn ich he had fabricated last night in bed; it wasn't exactly pel truth, but—well, it might have happened! It was all ut a man whom he had met in Yankton, an impoverished otchman, who had tried homesteading for two whole rs up in the James River country; but the Indians and fleas had been so annoying that they had finally driven n out of the place; his wife had died, and his cow had n stolen by the Indians! . . . Tönseten related the incit with a great show of sympathy.
The Sognings and Vossings were an inquiring people;
y had many questions to ask; of course they would con-er the Spring Creek locality before leaving it—that was ir business on this trip.

[1] These are the first three Norwegian settlements in the Northwest.

Immediately after breakfast they started out to surv the place. Sam Solum went with them, talking and e plaining volubly; Store-Hans also tagged along, and wi him was Sofie; but by noontime she was so tired fro scurrying around with Store-Hans, looking for badger hol and still more from listening to the ceaseless talk of Tö seten, that she could endure it no longer and ran hom After she left Store-Hans joined the rest of the grou now and then he would put in a word that sounded grow up when he thought the occasion called for it.

The prospective settlers kept asking and looking, a were still undecided about the matter; they liked the pla and yet they didn't; the land seemed good; it lay nice enough, and was easily tillable; but how bare and endle the scene was for the eye to rest upon! . . . Nothing b naked sky line all the way around! . . . It must be a des late place in winter, without even a bramble bush for shelte . . . And what were people to use for fuel? What f building material? Surely they couldn't live in sod hu all their lives! . . . These were a few of the objection and many more were added as the survey went on.

Tönseten fully realized what was at stake; he tremble with excitement; that day he argued and chattered until t small of his back ached and he had to sit down in she exhaustion. . . . But they were not able to advance a sing objection that he couldn't meet and do away with.

. . . "Wood for fuel and shelter?" . . . His voice lov ered with fervent zeal; his hands fought the air. . . Wood? Man alive, this was exactly one of their most va uable assets! Here folks could have just as much woo land as they wanted—no more, and no less! One of h neighbours had planted half an acre of trees this summe and had now gone for more seedlings; he would probab bring enough to plant another half acre when he returne —more than he and his descendants could ever use. . . "I'll just tell you, fellows, if it's only wood, you can go ea to the Sioux River as soon as you've unloaded your wagon and get enough trees planted this very fall to last you for nousand generations! I'll go along and help you, and it on't cost you a cent! . . . You see, folks, it's really a mat-r to be thankful for, that there aren't any woods already anding here; in these few months since we arrived, we've roken more land than one could break in ten years in a cut-wer country; in two years I'll have my whole quarter-section nder the plow! . . . For Heaven's sake, fellows, don't talk o me about wood!"

In this fashion Tönseten talked against time; he pictured ne future to them with a fervour that was prophetic; his eddish beard glowed as if with a living fire; his eyes eamed; his voice shook with emotion; his body trembled; s arms made magnificent sweeping gestures in the air. . . . le told about the schools which they would found, and the nurch which they would build together; about the thriving wn which would spring up on the spot where they stood, nd the railroads that would crisscross the prairie in every irection; for the railroad had already reached Worthing-on—soon it would be at Sioux Falls! Then they would ave only a twenty-five-mile journey to town—did they real-e that? Only twen-ty-five mi-les! . . . Tönseten chopped ne words up into syllables, and showed them each piece. . . . And just look at Sioux Falls! Why, only a year ago e had been obliged to go all the way down to Vermilion—ot a sign of a land office in Sioux Falls at that time! But ou could just bet that the government knew what it was bout in coming so far north—just wait and see! . . . Tön-eten apparently had the future all charted and laid out in etail before him; he never stumbled, never made a mistake; ne man burned with an unquenchable fire.

. . . If they would settle here now, more would be sure o follow next spring; then they would all be Norskies here —a settlement made to order for all of them! . . . But sup-ose they went to a place where no one had come yet? Couldn't they understand that all of Dakota Territory would ever be peopled? Why, there weren't enough folks in the whole world for that, and never would be, either! . . . Or if they should be so unfortunate as to choose a location wher no one followed after? . . . What then? . . .

The strangers listened seriously to him; they were force to admit that there was a good deal of common sense in wha he said.

The party did not get back to camp until late in the after noon. Then they cooked a substantial meal from the pota toes which Tönseten had given them; after that they hel council; the majority were for settling down right here.

When Tönseten heard the decision, he gave an excite laugh; he ran hurriedly into the house and told Kjersti, wh wept over the news; the next instant he had bounced ou again. He felt now that Destiny had used him as her too He had only reached out his hand, and, lo! he had brough in twenty neighbours with a single stroke—Norwegians every last mother's son of them! . . . This good fortun seemed so overwhelming, it had befallen him so suddenly that he wasn't willing to trust it too far. . . . When th strangers hitched up their horses and crossed the creek— they had decided to settle on the east side, with a chance t expand southward—he felt obliged to go along with them but after night had fallen and they had pitched their tents and he was forced to leave them—then he was full of alarms . . . Many things might happen during the night!

III

They would soon have to make another trip to town Beret looked forward to it with dread; it meant that Pe Hansa would be gone for a whole week's time. The evening were long and the nights hung heavy over the hut; she ha to struggle with so many fearful fancies—fancies that multi plied as time went on; though she felt unable to speak to hi about it—though he would be unable to help her if she did— yet it was a great relief to have him near, for then it seeme as if the horror dared not touch her. She dreaded each oc casion which took him away from home, even if it was onl or half a day's work with one of the neighbours. . . . And ow he would be gone for a whole week's time!

. . . She realized, too, that they would have to have pro- sions for the winter; the children were sadly in need of othes, and Per Hansa himself needed many things. But i her condition, these material affairs became more and ore unreal to her; it seemed as if she stood apart from em—they did not concern her. . . . All this she kept to erself, however; ah, what was the use of speaking where o one could hear! . . . She helped him get ready for the urney as if nothing were wrong; whenever he begged to now what he could buy for her and for the house, she ould stop to ponder the question with a distant look in her es, as if trying to think of many things which she couldn't or the moment remember. At that he would joke her, aying she mustn't be backward about it, for now they had enty of money; what was she standing there thinking of? . . . To this question he either would receive no answer at ll, or else he would hear her repeat what she had just been aying; or perhaps she would make some absent-minded, relevant remark, as if she had not heard him. . . . At nch times Per Hansa would look at his wife and sigh; then e would take hold of her and swing her around, trying to neer her. . . .

But beyond that he was too busy to pay much attention to er. On this trip to town he was going himself; Tönseten ad offered to lend him his horses and wagon, and had romised to stay home and look after things. The Sognings nd Vossings were still here; they needed advice and help i so many ways; and he, Tönseten, was just the man for iat; he held himself like a father to them—yes, like Provi- ence itself! . . . Per Hansa had a lot of plans to make efore starting out; he wasn't so short of money now; the ish were fond of potatoes and had been good customers; s for the Sognings, they seemed even fonder of potatoes nan the Irish; he had managed to sell them more than ten ollars' worth; however it had happened, his cash supply was a good deal larger to-day than when he had first arrived in the early summer.

On the other hand, there was no end to all the things he needed; he had jotted down a long list of articles that simply had to be bought, and a still longer list that he ought to get if the money only held out.

When the mother wasn't listening he talked earnestly to the boys of how they must look after the place during his absence. Ole, who was the bigger, would have to assume responsibility for everything out-of-doors; Injun, and Rosie, and the two oxen must be well taken care of; and then the wood—he must promise to chop up stacks of wood! . . . Store-Hans should serve as handy man to mother indoors; that was no easy job, even for a clever fellow like him—he understood that, of course? . . . The boys were far from enthusiastic over this arrangement; Ole had been hoping that his father would let him go along this time; he had taken pains to make himself useful on every occasion, ever since the trip had first been mentioned. Store-Hans, for his part, had harboured a secret hope that his father would bear in mind how exceedingly practical it was to have him along—he was so quick and handy about everything; he, too, had watched for every opportunity to please his father; he and his brother had often fought for the chance to run an errand. The disappointment hit Store-Hans the harder; here he would have to go pottering around like a hired girl —just like another woman! He fell to nagging, sulking, and fighting with his brother, all of which did not help in the least.

The father pitied him more than his older brother; he called him into the stable and talked to him long and confidentially, as though he were an old man with a long beard on his chin. . . . "You see, mother isn't in such condition that we can both leave her," he explained in a tone of open comradeship. "So if you go, I'll have to stay at home!" . . .

This was more than Store-Hans could understand; there wasn't anything the matter with mother, was there? She ked well enough, except for her face; but wasn't that bably because cold weather was coming on?

. . "Oh, she's healthy enough, Store-Hans—it isn't that, know. But"— the father's voice grew low and queer—ou'd better not tell this to your brother—but there may another little Store-Hans coming around here, say about istmas time; and mother will have to bear the brunt of t business! . . . You understand, now, we mustn't both ve her."

My, but this was strange! Deep wonderment rose in the s of Store-Hans. How could another come here—an-er boy? . . . He didn't dare to ask; he turned his head ay from his father; a glowing blush covered his face. . . . w he saw what the dream had meant that he had had the er night; he had seen both Joseph and Benjamin playing tt beyond the house; and with them had been a tiny little ow, who wasn't mentioned in the Bible story!

. . Oh yes . . . of course he would take care of mother! But, here was another thing: couldn't father get hold of notgun when he went to town? The last time Store-Hans l been to the swamps the ducks had been thicker than r. . . . And the Irish had settled awfully close to them!

. . Well, the father didn't know; he would see what he ld do; he had thought of another way to catch those cks, but what it was he wouldn't let out now.

ndeed, Per Hansa's mind was full of busy thoughts. . . . the cellar were many more potatoes than they could con-ne during the winter or use as seed next spring; and now was going to town with horses and wagon; it would be ange enough if he couldn't find people who needed food. as! however, it was now already the twelfth of October; ne nights it froze—and potatoes were sensitive to cold! t ever since the world was made the people of Nordland d known how to bring potatoes safely all the way up to foten, even in the middle of January. . . . It could cer-nly be done again, with a little care!

Per Hansa pondered, looked at the weather, sniffed and ed the air. On the afternoon before their departure he came to a decision: there were more potatoes than they could use; if they froze, they froze. Yes, sir! he would give it a try! And so he went over to Tönseten's and brought the wagon; he padded it thickly, bottom and sides, with soft hay; then he loaded it with potatoes in bulk. On top of the load he placed two sacks of rutabagas, and one of carrots; finally he picked out some of the nicest melons that were left in the cellar; these he tucked in between the sacks, covering everything with hay, and spreading some old clothes over the load.

Early the next morning they started off; Henry Solum and Hans Olsa went with him.

IV

The wagons drifted slowly through the outspread day, creeping on through indolent, drowsy fall sunshine and blue-green haze, toward a distant sky line from which hung a quivering yellow veil. For all they drove, the sky line came no closer; but when the purple shadows of evening fell there seemed to be a chance, at least, that they might reach it.

This was a great day for Per Hansa. Now he was traveling the very trail he should have followed on his way out last summer; but in one day's march he traversed a stretch that then took him four times as long. . . . All day the landscape was the same, yet its details seemed ever changing and ever new; prairies that extended to the end of the world; prairies that billowed into slopes, rose in low hills, then flattened out again and sank away into an endless plain.

The caravan headed for the sky; it steered straight onward. Now, at last, Per Hansa had time to look about him and rejoice in what he saw. . . . And all he saw was beautiful! Even the others, who had gone this way before, found many strange new things to look at, the farther they advanced into the bluish-yellow haze. . . . Here and there a sod hut peeped up from the ground, where last summer there was nothing but gopher hills.

Their goal that first day's journey was Split Rock Creek, ere they intended to camp for the night. They took turns h three teams at hauling Per Hansa's load, in order to e up on his horses and so make faster progress; thirty- nt miles they had come that day when they finally reached it Rock Creek, on the other side of the Sioux River; re they found a ford over the creek, and pitched their p on the eastern shore. . . . When they had been cross- the Sioux River earlier in the day—it seemed an almost elievably long while ago—they had stopped long enough atch three big pickerel. Now Per Hansa slung a kettle r the fire and cooked the fresh fish for supper; he buried e potatoes in the ashes next to the kettle. Soon they e all seated on the bank, partaking of a lordly feast for m, even though it was only of fish and potatoes. . . . The er purled by below, murmuring gently, reminding them much that was dear and half forgotten. . . . Conversa- flowed freely while they ate, but after they had finished egan to lull away. They laid more wood on the fire and out their pipes; then they could better hear what the oning waters told. Deep silence fell. . . . A big star d in the western sky, looking into their faces.

When the pipes had been emptied a second time they rose, ded to the horses for the night and crawled under the gons; there they slept dreamlessly until the day began e more to gild the blue wall of the east. The coffee was led; enough cold fish and potatoes were left from supper make a meal; very soon each one was seated in his wagon in, jogging still farther away from a place they knew . a place they seemed to remember . . . a place far off er the western skies, where a group of sod huts ought to lying! . . . Wasn't there such a place out there some- ere? But it seemed strangely vague and distant now! . Per Hansa braced up in his seat, put his mind intently Beret and Store-Hans—and then the sod huts stood out re vividly. . . .

. . Poor Beret-girl! If only she wouldn't be too lone- he while he was away!

This day's journey also turned out to be full of interestin things. As they went along, sod huts stood here and ther moping dejectedly, where, according to Hans Olsa and th Solum boy, no house should have been. . . . Good Hea vens! where had they all come from? Settlers must b swarming out of the ground like ants in summertime! . . Well, no—not so terribly many; it was only this, that ther shouldn't have been any at all! . . . Too bad! Why hadn these folks crossed a few more sky lines to the westwar before they settled down for good!

Late in the forenoon they came upon two sod houses whic must have sprung up since they were last here; neither Han Olsa nor the Solum boy could remember a trace of them Low and forlorn they lay there on the face of the prairie— only two sod huts, but situated so directly in their cours that they couldn't resist stopping to learn what kind of folk lived here. . . . Beyond the huts a man and his wife wer hard at work, breaking prairie; here, too, the sod must b tough of fibre, for the job didn't seem to be going very fast What first arrested the eyes of the travellers was the tean that pulled the plow; an ox with shining brass sockets on th ends of his huge horns had been yoked together with a skinn poll-cow. The woman walked alongside the team, driving the man, whose patriarchal beard swept his chest, steere the plow, pushing from behind with all his might.

These folks were Hallings [1]; Per Hansa and Hans Ols were very glad to hear it. A Halling is usually easy o approach; they at once struck up a conversation with thes people. . . . Only another incredible fairy tale! Wit nothing but this team, the man related, he had brought hi family and all his earthly possessions the whole distance fro Iowa, a matter of over four-hundred miles—"a long, la borious journey," as he quaintly expressed it.

—They surely hadn't made the whole trip with thos horses? asked Per Hansa.

—Why, certainly they had! . . . The Halling laughe

—How long had it taken?

[1] People from Hallingdal, in Norway.

–Oh, not so very long—seven weeks and two days, to be
ct. They hadn't been able to hurry, because of the cow; was the one who supplied most of their food, and so they
to be reasonable with her.

Do tell me!" said Per Hansa, flabbergasted. "You don't n to say that she's milking, that cow of yours?"

Certainly she's milking! . . . That is, when we don't e her too hard."

By God! that must be a wonderful cow! . . . But say,
: don't you need some potatoes with the milk? I've got hole load of 'em here that I'm trying to sell."

he Halling looked at him, his jaw dropping, and evily wanted to say something; but no sound came. A e was working there under the long beard which gave his le face a comical expression; it seemed for a moment
f the man might be chuckling; but when Per Hansa ed at him more closely, he discovered a film of moisture ne man's blinking eyes.

. . "Potatoes, you say? . . . Well, now!" . . .

he man wiped his eyes and regarded Per Hansa dumbly.
wife stood beside him; her face was long and drawn.
Suddenly she wept. . . .

Have you got any food in the house?" demanded Per sa.

Er—yes . . . as long as the cow gives milk!" . . . It the woman who supplied this information.

hen Per Hansa burst out laughing. . . . "Listen here, an—you run in after a pail, and we'll treat you to a de-meal . . . since we're the visitors!"

nd this is sure: it didn't take the woman long to produce pail! Per Hansa grabbed it from her, filled it with toes, and gave her a quick look—then looked again; at
. he poured the potatoes out on the ground, filled the sure once more, and gave her a second pailful.

. . "There you are—one for each of you; don't kill your-es eating, now!"

he man gazed at Per Hansa, blinked his eyes, coughed hatically, and said: "So far, so good. . . . But give me four more pailfuls, and I'll pay you a whole dollar whe I get the money; you'll probably be passing here again. . . If you should happen to die before that time, the potatoe wouldn't do you any good."

"No, but I might need the dollar!" laughed Per Hansa "But never mind—thanks for your offer, just the same . . . What do you say to eight pailfuls and two dollars— when you get the money?"

Then the Halling laughed so that his big beard shook . . . "Listen here, man; why not sixteen pailfuls and fou dollars? You'll get your money sometime. . . . To tell th truth, there's very little to eat in our house." . . .

The woman had already taken one pailful inside; now sh was down on her knees, gathering the loose potatoes in he skirt; she worked with feverish haste, using both her hands and eying Per Hansa askance from time to time.

Per Hansa laughed good-naturedly at the Halling. . . "Now I'll just tell you how we'll do this: you have enoug here for the time being; you can wait till I get back home— and then I'll bring you a whole load. . . . You need food man! . . . I'll take the money when I get it."

So the agreement was made; before they went on, how ever, Per Hansa gave them one of the left-over fishes, hal a pailful of carrots from the sack, and the nicest melon h could find on the load. . . . "Don't kill yourselves eating now!" were his parting words to the Hallings.

. . . Again he sat on the wagon, creaking along towar a yellowish-blue horizon; he couldn't remember when lif had been so much fun!

V

Around noon of the day after their visit with the Halling the three wagons entered Worthington. There was nothin much of an urban air about the place; as yet, the town con sisted merely of a couple of dozen houses scattered all abou some just rough shanties, others only sod huts; all bore th earmarks of having been hurriedly constructed, and intende

- for temporary shelter. The place had much the appearance of a camp, that to-day would be here, but to-morrow might have moved miles away. However, it contained a couple of stores; and most important item of all—the railroad, the main artery of life in this far region, had made its way thither.

Per Hansa drove from house to house, greeting the people with a cheerful grin and asking in his broadest Nordland dialect if they didn't want any potatoes; he said nothing of the other wares which he had brought. Luck wasn't sitting in every doorway waiting for him, however; the peddling proved to be a slow business. Not until he reached a sod house at the other end of the town did he make a bargain worth mentioning; here he happened on a widow with two half-grown boys; the widow was Danish and ran a small poultry farm.

. . . Yes, indeed, she needed potatoes, for both herself and the boys, and for the birds as well; she hadn't any money in the house, but she had the chickens. . . . Wouldn't he like some potatoes for a fowl or two?

—Of course he would! Per Hansa was more than willing—after dickering awhile, he bartered nine pails of potatoes for three young chickens.

—This is a mighty profitable deal!—he thought—The Danish things are good people, but the Danes are even better.

"Listen, Mother, perhaps you'd just as soon take three pailfuls more and give me the fourth hen?" . . . The widow agreed to that at once and Per Hansa felt that now he had made a fine bargain indeed.

The widow, too, seemed very well satisfied; they beamed with mutual gratitude, filled with generous thoughts. Their eyes looked into each other's. . . .

. . . Per Hansa started to leave. But the widow wouldn't hear of such a thing; of course he mustn't leave yet awhile! She had an old rooster cooking on the stove; it had been cooking since early in the forenoon and ought to be tender pretty soon; he must unhitch his horses and tie them to the wagon, and then come inside; where there was enough for three, there would always be something left over for a fourth . . . Now he must go and do as she said, and then come right in! . . . Per Hansa wasn't refusing!

But when he saw the inside of the hut he grew more enthusiastic over it than he had been over the widow; if her face had been bright and cheerful, the face of the room in which he now found himself was even more attractive; it seemed that he had never seen anything so cozy as this room. It was only a sod hut, smaller than his own, with three tiny chambers; but a homely feeling pervaded every nook and corner of it. But best of all, the walls were not a dirty black like those in his house; they were a dazzling white—a white so pure and gleaming that it caught up and reflected the gold of the sun! . . . A real fairy house, that's what it was!

Per Hansa looked and looked—and forgot to sit down. . . . "No, never mind the food, Mother," he said. "I'd rather you would tell me how you've gone about it to make things so extra fine in here! Is this paint, I'd like to know. . . . It must be terribly expensive!" . . . His face showed nothing but sheer good nature and open admiration as he stood there looking into her eyes; she gave him a merry laugh, as though she had known him for many a year.

—Oh no, it wasn't paint at all—far from it! Just ordinary lime and water!

—Lime? . . . What did they call that in English? . . . Lime, lime. . . . He said the word over to himself a number of times. . . . My, how strange everything was! . . . How did they mix it? Could it be bought in town? Was it very expensive?

The widow gave him all the desired information while she prepared the meal; she rattled on in a steady stream as she went about her work. He needn't worry about remembering the name; there was a Norwegian lumberman in town who sold the stuff; perhaps he might be able to barter potatoes for it! . . . Thus and thus he must mix it.

"You're crazy, Mother!" interrupted Per Hansa; he stood in the middle of the floor, overcome by a wild impulse to

; the cheery widow. . . . "Do you actually think he might e potatoes? I've got some carrots and melons, too!
.. I swear, Mother, that if I had met you in time, I would re courted you!"

The man's happiness was so rollicking and genuine that widow suddenly burst out laughing. . . . He might have ie a worse thing than that for himself! she answered.
telling how that courting might have turned out! . .
But now dinner was ready. In came two little boys, with dy, beaming faces, just like their mother's; it seemed to Hansa as if he would never tire of looking at them;
n he remembered the melons, and went out for the best he could find; he brought it in and placed it on the floor.
.. He sat there eating the rooster with the widow and boys—and it all seemed exactly like a fairy tale. As ir as daylight, luck was with him now! . . . Before he k his leave, he gave the boys another melon, and half a l ful of carrots to the mother.

. . "It's a sin to ruin good-hearted people!" he said.

ndeed, luck followed Per Hansa that day. From the ow's he drove straight to the lumberman's, and asked if would barter some building materials for a load of pota-s and other such delicacies; the man came over to look at load. . . . Yes, that wasn't at all impossible. What did want, and how much of it, for his load?

Per Hansa gave a loud laugh at this question: "I really uld have everything you've got in the place! . . . But I'll reasonable and take a few sacks of lime and a few pieces boards. You carry lime, don't you?"

The dicker finally resulted in Per Hansa's getting all the e he needed, more lumber than he expected, and even some ls thrown into the bargain. The boards were planed oth; Per Hansa handled them as if they had been the leaves of some costly book.

. . "A dandy boat this is going to make for the little ow to rock in! . . . Now he can come along any time!"
.. He turned to the lumberman: "Next fall I'll show up here and buy out your whole shebang; I need all you've got, and lots more too, let me tell you!"

After that he had to chat a little while with this man; it seemed so pleasant to meet a Norwegian here; Per Hansa felt as if a part of the town belonged to him. He found so many questions to ask, so many matters that he wanted to be posted on; the lumberman, who wasn't very busy just then, seemed more than willing to talk and to hear how things were getting on, out to the westward where they lived. Per Hansa sat chatting with him a long time.

In the meanwhile his companions had finished their trading and had eaten their dinner; when he finally drove up to the general store they were loading their wagons with the merchandise they had bought. As soon as this was done all three entered the store again.

The moment he got in there among the many different kinds of merchandise, Per Hansa began to grow uneasy. Pleasant odours from all the wares mingled in the air; a strong scent of whisky permeated the whole place; he went sniffing about and stamping on the floor, moving restlessly from one thing to another.

. . . "Oh, the devil! If I wasn't so short of money! . . . But it won't do any harm to know where they keep things, when once we get the cash—eh, boys?"

Before he started trading, Per Hansa had to make an agreement about the plow and the rake, which stood on the books against him; the Solum boy acted as interpreter.

—He could pay the whole amount, of course?—the trader asked, as if taking it for granted.

—Is the fellow plumb crazy! Per Hansa shouted.

—Huh! how much could he pay, then?

"Tell him fifteen dollars, Henry—and that's the last cent, too!"

The trader's voice grew hard as he asked: Was that all?

—Yes, that was all!—said Per Hansa; a hard note had come into his voice, too.—He hadn't anything more, unless the fellow wanted to take his hide. But as for that—here laughed and looked the man in the eye—the hide was so and wrinkled that it wasn't good for much.

—We-ell—drawled the merchant—this was pretty poor iiness; but he would let it pass this time. He'd be amed to take such a weather-beaten hide. . . . Did Per nsa have anything at home?

—You bet he had!—laughed Per Hansa.—A wife and e youngsters, and one cow! . . . And something more ning! . . .

—Huh!—said the other, his face hardening again.—He ld keep his wife and youngsters; but the cow he would e to forfeit eventually, if he couldn't raise other means. .. Business was business!

he matter was finally arranged, however, in the way that Hansa wanted it; the balance of the amount should stand il next fall, at fifteen per cent interest.

hen Per Hansa started to trade. The first thing he ed for was net twine! . . . The Solum boy and Hans a burst out laughing; was he planning to knit a net out e on the open prairie? . . . Never mind; he needed twine wine first and foremost! When he finally had found a d that he thought might do, he bought several balls; and n he called for rope—he had to have rope for the sheet- —how could he get along without that? . . . It seemed his companions that he was wasting good money; it was ong way to the Sioux River and few trips could be made ring the year! This they pointed out to him emphatically. t it did not affect him at all. . . . "Just order that rope me, Henry!" commanded Per Hansa.

Now the real provisioning, for which he had come all this tance, was ready to begin; he ordered a few trifles, in h a low, bashful voice, that Henry had to ask him a ond time before he understood; just some calico of a dy pattern, a few bits of ribbon and thread, and some t, dainty white cotton goods. And, listen here—this was y important—some Hoffman's drops, and a small bottle sweet oil! . . . It was awfully awkward to have to the Solum boy as interpreter in such matters—he was only a bachelor and had tried so few things in this world Per Hansa managed to get what he wanted, however. . . Next, the real needs of the household had to be met; flou was the most important item, and came first on the list; ther cloth, and tobacco, and matches, and kerosene; after tha coffee, and molasses, and salt. This item of salt again threw his companions into consternation; Per Hansa ordered such an unreasonable quantity of it, and still he wondered if it wouldn't be too little! . . . Lord! there was no limit to all the things Per Hansa thought he must have; but his money soon ran out and that put an end to the trading.

At last they were ready to leave.

"Aren't we going to have a single drop on this trip?" Hans Olsa mused aloud.

"There you said something!" exclaimed Per Hansa. "That reminds me—I was to get three bottles for Syvert. But not a word about it to Kjersti—bear that in mind when we get home. . . . He's going to use it as liniment for his rheumatism, you know!"

The trader treated them all around before he filled the bottles. Henry got two bottles for himself, and one for his brother; Hans Olsa had brought along his Sunday bottle to be filled; as that would hardly be enough he bought a smaller one, which he put in his pocket; Per Hansa got two for himself, and three for Tönseten. . . . When the trader had filled all their orders he felt that he had had such good business with these fellows that he could well afford to stand another round of treats—they seemed to be such decent folk too! And before they left they felt obliged to follow the good old custom of sampling one another's bottles. Good Lord! it wasn't every day that they came to town. . . . Hans Olsa was stepping very cautiously when he climbed into his wagon; he planked himself down upon the seat with slow and ponderous movements; but once down, there his big bulk sat secure.

It was late in the afternoon when they finally set out for home. Ninety long miles lay ahead of them, but no one thought of that; they had plenty of food, the vaulted heavens

r a roof wherever they chose to camp, and fair weather send them on. . . .

Per Hansa drove in the van; he was continually clucking his horses. His eyes were fixed on the western sky, ready tinted by the strong glow of evening. . . . God! ow beautiful these prairies were! . . . Why couldn't they eep on driving all night long? . . .

When they at last pitched camp at the end of the day, nd Hans Olsa had made the fire and hung the porridge ot over it, Per Hansa sat down by the firelight and began whittle some shuttles for net knitting; he made two shut-es, and then a reel.

His companions laughed at him and told him he must be razy; first he had thrown away good money on a lot of wine, and now he was wasting his time over such nonsense! . . . "Never mind," said Per Hansa with his merry laugh. One only talks according to his sense!" . . . He kept on orking till he had finished the reel.

VI

The days were long for the boys during their father's bsence. Ole soon tired of standing at the chopping block ithout the company of his brother; he idled aimlessly about, nd made frequent errands into the house to see whether he ouldn't hatch up something to break the monotony. Store-Hans wasn't much better off; the secret which his father had ntrusted to him was certainly interesting; but it wasn't uite fascinating enough to hold its own with the vision of ne ducks out there in the swamps. The father would surely ring something home from town to solve this problem; e and his brother ought to be over west reconnoitering every pare minute of the time. And now the Irish had all gone way, too; their sod huts were standing empty; there would e many curious things to look at and pry into! . . . Besides, heir mother said so little these days; it was no fun to be vith her any longer. Often when he spoke to her she was ot there; she neither saw nor heard him, said only yes and no, which seemed to come from far away. . . . Probably she was brooding over the strange thing about to happen, Store-Hans told himself; he often looked wonderingly at her, thinking many thoughts beyond his years. . . . He remembered his father's words, and never left her for long, although it was very lonesome for him in the house.

A couple of days after the men's departure, she sent the boy over to Kjersti to borrow a darning needle; she had hidden her own away so carefully that she could not find it. Such things occurred commonly now; she would put something away, she could not remember where, and would potter around looking for it without really searching; at last, she would forget altogether what she was about, and would sit down with a peculiarly vacant look on her face; at such times she seemed like a stranger. . . . Ole was sitting in the house that morning, finishing a sling-shot which he had just made.

Suddenly Store-Hans came darting back with the needle; he had run until he was all out of breath. He burst out with the strangest news, of Tönseten's having killed a big animal; it was awfully big—almost like a bear! . . . Tönseten said it was a bear, so it must be true! Tönseten and Kjersti were skinning him right now; Kjersti had told him that if he would bring a pail, they could have fresh meat for supper. Both boys immediately began pleading for permission to go and see the animal; their mother scarcely answered; she gave them a pail and asked them not to stay long.

The boys came running down the hill just as Kjersti was cutting up the carcass; Tönseten was struggling with the hide, trying to stretch it on the barn door; his mouth bristled with nails, his hands were bloody—he was a frightful spectacle!

"What's that you've got?" asked Ole.

"Bear, my boy—bear!" . . . Tönseten wagged his head, took the nails out of his mouth, and spat a gob of tobacco juice.

"Bear!" snorted Ole, scornfully.

"That's no bear!" put in Store-Hans, though less doubtgly.

"By George! boys, to-day he had to bite the dust!" . . .

"But there aren't any bears out here, I tell you!" Ole protsted.

"Is that so—huh? . . . There isn't an animal living that ru can't find out here!" Tönseten spoke with such certainty at it was difficult for the boys to gainsay him.

"Where did you get him?" Store-Hans asked.

"Out west of the Irish a little way. . . . There were two 'em; they had gone into the ground for the winter; this the young one, you see—the old mammy got away from e!"

"But you didn't have any gun!" was Ole's next objection.

"Better than that, my boy! . . . I went for him with the owbar!" Tönseten spat fiercely and looked at the boys. . "I smashed in his skull! . . . With that old bar I'd ckle either a tiger or a rhinoceros!"

"What became of the old she-bear?" Ole asked, falling der the spell of Tönseten's enthusiasm.

"She went north across the prairie, lickety-split! . . . me here, now—take some of these chunks of meat home th you. . . . This will make delicious stew, let me tell u!"

"Is it fit to eat?" asked Store-Hans, still doubting.

"Fit to eat? No finer meat to be found than bear meat—n't you know that?"

The boys followed him over to where Kjersti was still tting up the animal; it must have been a large carcass, for e cut meat made a sizable heap.

"Is it . . . is it really bear?" asked Ole, in a more humble ne.

"He's meaty enough for it! . . . Here, give me the pail; eret needs some good, strengthening food. . . . Maybe ou'll take a little to Sörrina, too; you can stop in with it the way. . . . Careful—don't spill it, now!"

The boys loitered along on the way home; from time to me they had to put down the pail, in order to discuss this extraordinary event. . . . So there actually were bears slinking about this country! . . . If bears, there must be lions and tigers and other such wild beasts; this was worth while! . . . Suppose they were to go home and get Old Maria, hunt up the she-bear herself, and put a big bullet clear through her head? They thrilled with excitement. . . . "Do you dare to shoot her off?" Store-Hans demanded of his brother; Ole scowled ominously and clenched his fists. . . . "I! . . . I'd aim straight for her temple, and she'd drop deader than a herring!" . . . "Yes, aim at her temple!" Store-Hans advised, soberly. "And if it's close range, you must draw the bead very fine!" . . . "Fine as a hair!" said Ole, excitedly.

They picked up the pail at last, and finally succeeded in reaching Sörine's, where there was another long delay; a detailed account had to be given of the marvellous feat which Tönseten had performed.

When they were about to leave Sofie came out and wanted to know if they weren't frightened; maybe the old mother bear was slinking about the prairie right now, looking for her cub! The boys lingered to talk with her; they drew a glowing picture for the girl of how they were going home this minute to get Old Maria, and then go hunting for the she-bear herself . . . just watch them bring home a real roast pretty soon! . . . But weren't they scared? she asked. . . . "Scared?" exclaimed Store-Hans. . . . "Oh, fiddlesticks!" cried Ole. "Only girls and old women get scared!"

Sofie only laughed; at which they affected a swaggering gruffness and tried to spit like Tönseten—but theirs wouldn't come brown. . . .

They were gone such a long time that their mother grew anxious; when they came over from Sörine's at last she stood outside the door watching for them. She had dressed And-Ongen, and was almost on the point of starting out to search; the boys were too preoccupied to notice this; Store-Hans spoke first:

"Just think, there's a big she-bear over there to the westward!" . . .

"We're going to take the gun and shoot her!" exclaimed le, gleefully.

"We'll aim straight for her temple!" Store-Hans assured s mother.

"Now we'll have plenty of bear meat!" continued Ole in e next breath, with absolute confidence.

The boys were all raging excitement; their mood frightned Beret still more; she grasped them frantically, one hand n the shoulder of each, and gave them a hard shake. . . . hey were to go inside this very minute, and take their ooks! They weren't going out of this house to-day! . . . Go in, don't you hear me! . . . Go in!" . . .

. . . But this wasn't fair! Ole began reasoning with his other; he used strong words, his eyes flaming. . . . Didn't e realize that there was a real bear over to the westward— real full-grown grizzly bear! . . . Mother . . . please . . . please! . . . Dad wasn't home, but the gun was all aded and ready; they could easily manage the rest of it! n an hour's time they would have that bear's hide! Store-Hans even thought that he could go straight to the lair. . . . right through the temple they would put the bullet! . . . he boys carried on like a raging hurricane.

The mother had to use force to get them indoors. . . . Go in, I say, and take your books! Can't you hear what m saying?" . . .

This was hard on them; they burst into the house like wo mad bull calves; she had to repeat the order several mes more before they finally submitted and began to hunt or their books. At last Ole snatched up the "Epitome," is brother the "Bible History." They sat down to read by e table in front of the window, in a state of mutinous ebellion.

Trouble soon arose. Each wanted the seat immediately in ront of the window, where the most light fell; and neither ould give up the position. A terrible battle broke out; Ole as the stronger, but his brother the quicker. On account f his age and size Ole considered himself the legitimate aster of the house in the absence of his father, and therefore had the right to do anything; he now burst out with words which he had heard in the mouths of the men when something went wrong with their work. As soon as Store-Hans heard this he too began to use vile language; if Ole dared, he certainly did; he knew those words, and plenty more! . . . The boys kept up their scrimmage until they almost upset the table; their books suffered bad treatment and lay scattered about on the floor. And-Ongen watched them open-mouthed until she suddenly grew frightened and set up a howl.

Over by the stove the mother was washing the meat, putting it into a kettle which she had placed on the fire. . . . Although she heard every word, she kept on working in silence; but her face turned ashen grey.

When she had finished the task she went out hurriedly; in a moment she came back with a willow switch in her hand. Going straight over to the table, she began to lay about her with the switch; she seemed beside herself, struck out blindly, hit whatever she happened to aim at, and kept it up without saying a word. The switch whizzed and struck; shrieks of pain arose. The boys at once stopped fighting and gazed horror-stricken at their mother; they could not remember that she had ever laid a hand on them before. . . . And now there was such a strange, unnatural look in her eyes! . . .

They flew out on the floor to gather up their books, while the blows continued to rain down upon them; And-Ongen stood in the middle of the floor, screaming with terror. . . .

Not until the mother struck amiss, breaking the switch against the edge of the table, did she stop. . . . Suddenly she seemed to come to her senses; she left the child screaming in the middle of the floor, went out of the house, and was gone a long time. When she came back, she carried an armful of wood; she went over to the stove and fed the fire; then she picked up And-Ongen, and lay down on the bed with her. . . . The boys sat quietly at the table reading; neither of them had the courage to look up. . . .

The house seemed strangely still after the passage of the torm. Ole put his fingers into his ears to shut out the rrible silence; his brother began to read aloud. It was ad enough for Ole, but worse for Store-Hans; he now ecalled clearly what his father had confided in him; he ought of his own solemn promise; here he had been away rom the house nearly the whole day! He felt burning hot l over his body. . . . He had opened the book where it ld about the choosing of the twelve disciples, and now he ied to read; but that wasn't the stuff for him just now! . . . He turned the pages forward to the story of Samson, nd read it diligently; then to David and Goliath; then to e story about Joseph and his brethren. The last eased s heart somewhat. . . . Joseph was just the sort of boy at he longed to be!

Ole had felt ashamed at the sight of his mother bringing the wood, though that was not his task; his brother was be the hired girl! . . . Suddenly anger seized him; this me it certainly was the fault of Store-Hans—he should ave given him the place! . . . He dragged himself through ne Third Article, which he knew perfectly well already; hen the tumult within him had somewhat subsided he sat here thinking of how shamefully Tönseten must have deeived them. . . . He kill a bear! It was nothing but a easly old badger! And now this nasty stuff was cooking n the stove—they were going to have it for supper! And nother was so angry that one would never dare to explain to her! . . . There sat his younger brother, snuffling and eading his brains out; plain to be seen that he would never mount to anything! . . . Ole closed his book with a bang, ot up, and went outdoors to chop more wood; but he did ot dare to look at the bed as he passed. . . .

Store-Hans sat over his book until it grew so dark that e could no longer distinguish the letters. . . . From time o time he looked up; his mother lay on the bed perfectly till; he could not see her face; And-Ongen was fast asleep vith her head high on the pillow The boy rose quietly, ooked around—then took an empty pail and went out for vater. He left the pailful of water outside the door; then he brought Rosie and Injun and the two oxen into the stable, and tied them up for the night. He spoke loudly and gruffly to the animals; mother should hear that he was tending to business! . . . When he finally brought in the water his mother was up again; he could see nothing unusual about her.

. . . No, she hadn't been crying this time! The thought made Store-Hans so happy that he went straight to his brother, who was toiling over the chopping block as if possessed, and made friends with him again. The boys stayed outside until it was pitch dark; they talked fast and nervously, about a multitude of things; but that which weighed most heavily on their hearts—the way their mother's face had looked when she whipped them—they could not mention.

Inside the house the lamp had been lit. And-Ongen toddled about the floor, busy over her own little affairs; the boys came in quietly and sat down to their books again; but very little reading was done now. . . . At last the kettle of meat that had been boiling on the stove was ready; the mother put the food on the table; the boys drew up, Ole somewhat reluctantly. . . . "You get that troll stuff down!" he whispered to his brother, making a wry face. To this command Store-Hans made no answer; he had stuck his spoon into a crack between the boards of the table; they were large, those cracks—he could see a broad section of floor when he laid his eye down close. The earthen floor had such a rich brown colour in the dim sheen of the lamp; the cracks in the table made stripes across the shadow down there; it looked pretty, too—and just then it had occurred to Store-Hans how nice it would be if they could only have the floor looking like that by daylight.

The mother filled the big bowl from the kettle and put it on the table; she had made a thick stew, with potatoes, carrots, and pieces of the meat; it looked appetizing enough but somehow the boys felt in no hurry to start. The mother came and sat down, bringing And-Ongen with her; the child was so delighted over the holiday fare they had tonight that she hurried to say grace.

She and the mother immediately began to eat; the boys no nger had an excuse to sit watching. Store-Hans dipped o a spoonful of the stew, blew on it, closed his eyes, and ulped it down. Ole did the same, but coughed as if he had wallowed the wrong way; then he leaned under the table nd spat it out. . . .

The mother asked quietly how they liked the supper. . . . t that, Ole could no longer restrain himself; he looked at s mother imploringly, and said in a tear-choked voice as he id his spoon aside:

"It tastes like dog to me!"

To Store-Hans it seemed a shameful thing for Ole to peak that way of food which their mother had prepared or them; he swallowed spoonful after spoonful, while sweat oured from him.

"I have heard it said many times," the mother went on, uietly, "that bear meat is all right. . . . The stew has a ngy taste, I notice, but not so bad that it can't be eaten. . . You'd better leave the meat if you don't like it."

'It isn't bear at all!" Ole blurted out.

'What?" cried the mother in alarm, lowering her spoon.

"It's only a lousy old badger! . . . I've heard dad say ften that they aren't fit to eat!" . . .

"It's true, every word of it!" cried Store-Hans, suddenly eeling frightened and jamming his spoon farther down into ne crack. . . . "I could tell it by his tail—Syvert had forotten to cut it off! . . . Oh, I'm going to be sick—I can eel it coming!"

Beret got up, trembling in every limb; she took the bowl nd carried it out into the darkness; a long way from the ouse she emptied it on the ground; And-Ongen cried and oddled after her. . . . The boys sat on at the table, glaring eproachfully at each other; in the eyes of both blazed the ame accusation:

"A nice mess you've made of things! Why didn't you eep your mouth shut?"

The mother came in again; she set the empty kettle on the tove and scoured it out carefully. . . . Then she cooked porridge for them, but when it was ready she could eat nothing herself. . . .

. . . That night she hung still more clothes over the window than she had the evening before. She sat up very late; it seemed as if she was unable to go to bed.

VII

She had been lying awake a long time; sleep would not come. Her thoughts drifted. . . .

. . . So it had come to this; they were no longer ashamed to eat troll food; they even sent it from house to house, as lordly fare!

All night long as she tossed in bed, bitter revolt raged within her. They should not stay here through the winter! . . . As soon as Per Hansa came home they must start on the journey back east; he, too, ought to be able to see by this time that they would all become wild beasts if they remained here much longer. Everything human in them would gradually be blotted out. . . . They saw nothing, learned nothing. . . . It would be even worse for their children—and what of their children's children? . . . Couldn't he understand that if the Lord God had intended these infinities to be peopled, He would not have left them desolate down through all the ages . . . until now, when the end was nearing? . . .

After a while the bitterness of her revolt began to subside; her thoughts became clear and shrewd, she tried to reason out the best way of getting back to civilization. That night she did not sleep at all.

The next morning she got up earlier than usual, kindled the fire, got the breakfast and waked the children. The food was soon prepared; first she poured some water into the pot, put in a spoonful or two of molasses, and added a few pieces of cinnamon; then she cut into bits the cold porridge from last night, and put them into the big bowl; when the sweetened water was hot she poured it over the porridge. . . . This was all they had—and no one asked for more.

While she ate she looked repeatedly at the big chest, trying recall how everything had been packed when they came tt last summer. Where did she keep all the things now? ne had better get the packing done at once—then that job ould be out of the way when he came home. . . .

The greatest difficulty would be to obtain wagons. . . . las! those old wagons! The smaller one he had taken art and used in making the very table around which they ere now seated; as for the larger wagon, she knew only o well that it would never hang together through the long urney back; only the other day she had heard Per Hansa ention that he intended to break it up, and see if he couldn't ake something or other out of it. . . . Well—how to get e wagons would be his business! They certainly couldn't erish out here for want of a wagon or two! Was there ot One who once upon a time had had mercy on a great ty full of wicked people, only because one just human ing interceded?

. . . One just human being. . . . Alas! . . . Beret sighed avily and put her hand up under her breast.

When there was no more porridge left in the bowl she se, washed the dish, and put it away on the shelf. Ole d nothing to do in the house that morning; he walked ward the door, motioning to his brother to follow; but tore-Hans shook his head. Then Ole went out; the other y sat there looking at his mother, not knowing what to do, nhappy and heavy-hearted; he felt a sudden impulse to row himself down on the floor and weep aloud.

The mother was pottering about at some trifles, her noughts constantly occupied with the idea of returning to vilization. Into her serious, grey-pale face, still soft and eautiful, had crept an expression of firmness and defiance; on this aspect grew so marked that her face appeared to imulate anger, like that of one playing at being ferocious ith a child.

As soon as she had finished her housework she went over o the big chest, opened the lid, sank down on her knees eside it, and began to rearrange the contents. The task was quickly done; then she took the clothes from the last washing, folded them up, and laid them carefully in the chest; there weren't many clothes left now! He ought to realize that they would soon be naked if they stayed here much longer! And where were they to get money for everything they needed out here? . . . Beret stood up and looked around the room, trying to decide what to pack first. On the shelf above the window lay an old Bible, a gift to her from her grandfather; it was so old that it was hard to read now, because of the many changes the language had undergone since then; but it was the only one they had. This book had been in her family many generations; her great-grandfather had owned it before her grandfather; from her it should pass on to Store-Hans; thus she had always determined when she thought of the matter. On top of the Bible lay the hymn book, in which she had read a little every Sunday since their arrival here. . . .

She put both books in the chest.

Again Beret rose and glanced around the room. Perhaps she had better take the school books, too; the boys were none too eager to use them; they might as well be excused for the rest of the day; either that day or the next the father would surely come. . . . She asked Store-Hans to bring the books to her so that she could pack them.

Not until then did the boy fully take in what his mother was doing; it startled him so that for a moment he could not get up.

"Mother, what are you doing?" . .

"We must begin to get ready!" . . . She sighed, and pressed her hands tightly under her burden; it was painful to her, stooping over so long at a time.

"Get ready? Are . . . are we going away?" . . . Store-Hans's throat contracted; his eyes stared big and terror-stricken at his mother.

"Why, yes, Hansy-boy—we had better be going back where people live before the winter is upon us," she told him, sadly.

The boy had risen, and now stood at the end of the table;

wanted to go to his mother but fear chained him to the ; he stared at her with his mouth wide open. At last ot out:

What will dad say?" . . . The words came accusingly there were tears in them.

e looked at him like one in a dream; again she looked, could not utter a word. . . . The sheer impossibility of she was about to do was written as if in fire on the face whole body of the boy—as if in rays that struck her, ed everything up with an awful radiance, and revealed utter futility of it all. . . . She turned slowly toward hest, let down the lid, and sank on it in untold weariness.

Again the child stirred within her, kicking and twist- so that she had to press her hand hard against it.

. . O God! . . . now he was protesting, too! Was it by ruthless sacrifice of life that this endless desolation d ever be peopled?

. . "Thou canst not be so cruel!" she moaned. . . . "De- d not this awful sacrifice of a frail human being!" . . . e rose slowly from the chest; as she walked across loor and opened the door she felt as if she were drag- leaden weights. . . . Her gaze flitted fearfully toward sky line—reached it, but dared not travel upward. . . . core-Hans remained at the end of the table, staring her; he wanted to scream, but could not utter a sound. n he ran to her, put his arms around her, and whispered sely between sobs:

Mother, are you . . . are you . . . getting sick now?" eret stroked the head that was pressed so hard against side; it had such a vigorous, healthy warmth; the hair soft and pleasant to the touch; she had to run her fingers ugh it repeatedly. . . . Then she stooped over and put arm around the boy; his response to her embrace was iolent that it almost choked her . . . O God! how sorely needed some one to be kind to her now! . . . She was bing; Store-Hans, too, was struggling with wild, tearing . Little And-Ongen, who could not imagine what the were doing over there by the door, came toddling to them and gazed up into their faces; then she opened he mouth wide, brought her hand up to it, and shrieked aloud . . . At that moment Ole came runing down the hill, hi feet flying against the sky, and shouted out to them:

"They are coming! . . . Get the coffee on!"

. . . Gone was the boy like a gust of wind; he threw himself on the pony and galloped away to meet the returning caravan.

Beret and Store-Hans had both sprung to their feet and stood looking across the prairie. . . . Yes, there they were away off to the southeast! . . . And now Store-Hans, also forgot himself; he glanced imploringly into his mother's face, his eyes eagerly questioning:

"Would it be safe to leave you while I run to meet dad?"

She smiled down into the eager face—a benign, spreading smile.

"Don't worry about me. . . . Just run along." . . .

VIII

The father sat at the table eating, with And-Ongen on his knee; the boys stood opposite him, listening enthusiastically to the story of his adventures along the way; the mother went to and fro between the stove and the table. There was an enchanting joyousness about Per Hansa to-day which coloured all he said; no matter how much he told, it always sounded as if he were keeping back the best till later on. This had a positively intoxicating effect on the boys; it made them impatient and eager for more, and caused a steady flood of fresh questions.

Even Beret was smiling, though her hand trembled.

At last the boys had to give an account of how they had managed affairs at home. When, after much teasing and banter, Per Hansa had finally heard the whole absurd story—it came little by little, in disjointed outbursts—of Tönseten and the bear, and their ill-starred badger stew of the night before, he laughed until the tears came and he had to stop eating. His mirth was so free and ty that the boys, too, began to see the real fun of the ent, and joined in boisterously. Beret stood over he stove, listening to it all; their infectious merriment ed her away, but at the same time she had to wipe her . . . . She was glad that she had remembered to take of the chest the things that she had begun to pack awhile re!

Come here, Store-Hans," said the father, still laughing. hat's that across the back of your neck?"

he question caught the boy unawares; he ran over and d beside his father.

Why, it's a big red welt! . . . Have you been trying to g yourself, boy?"

core-Hans turned crimson; he suddenly remembered the ful blows of last night.

He glanced quickly at his mother. . . . "Oh, pshaw!" he with a manly air. . . . "That was only Hans and me cing!"

Ah-ha!" exclaimed the father, with another laugh. "So 's the way you two have been acting while I was away? her couldn't manage you, eh? . . . Well, now you'll soon ancing to a different tune; we've got so much work on our ls that there won't be any peace here day or night. . . . nks for good food, Beret-girl!"

He got up, took the boys with him, and began to carry gs in from the wagon. Most of the load they stored y in the house; some extra things, however, had to find mporary place in the stable.

t length Per Hansa brought in a small armful of bottles set them on the table.

Come here, Beret-girl of mine! You have earned a d drink, and a good drink you shall have!" . . . He t over to the water pail with the coffee cup from which had just been drinking, rinsed it out with a little water, emptied it on the floor; then he poured out a good cupful of whisky and offered it to her. She put out hand as if to push him away. . . . Yes, indeed, she ld have to take it, he told her, putting his arm around her waist and lifting the cup to her lips. She took the cup and emptied it in one draught. . . . "There, that's a good little wife! . . . You're going to have just another little drop!" He went to the table again and poured out a second drink, but not so much this time. "Two legs, and one for each! Just drink it down! . . . And now you take care of the bottles!"

That was a busy day in the humble dwelling of Per Hansa. First of all, he had promised a load of potatoes to the Hallings, who waited back east somewhere under a bleak sky without even a potato peeling to put in their pot; he must carry food to them. When Beret heard how poorly things were in that hut—about the woman with the drawn cheeks and the starved look in her eyes—she straightway began to hurry him up; he must go while he had the horses and wagon here. Couldn't he get started to-day?

"Not so hasty there, my girl, not so hasty!" laughed Per Hansa, his face beaming. . . . "I'm not going to sleep with any Halling woman to-night—that I can tell you!"

Now he was his old irresistible self again. How strong, how precious to her, he seemed! . . . She felt a loving impulse to grasp his hair and shake him. . . .

Ole was immediately put to work knitting the net. The father had already knitted four fathoms of it, by the light of the camp fire the night before; he had sat up working over the net long after the others had turned in. . . . The boys grew wild with enthusiasm at the sight of the net—were they going fishing in the Sioux River? Both of them immediately began begging to be taken along. . . . "Just keep your fingers moving, Olamand—hurry them up, I tell you!" . . . The father made a great mystery of it, and refused to give any further explanation.

As for himself and Store-Hans, they busied themselves over the lime; it was all carried inside and placed in a corner where no moisture could reach it. The preparation for the mixing required a good deal of work; the first thing was to make a wooden box sufficiently tight to hold water. Well, there was plenty of lumber now, at any rate! Per sa built the box and carried it down to the creek; there aced it under water, hoping that it would swell enough tight by the time he needed it.

ening fell all too soon on a wonderfully busy and joyful The boys were at last in bed, fast asleep.

tt Per Hansa had no time for rest; to-night that net y had to be finished. He finally made Beret go to bed, he wasn't a bit sleepy; she lay there talking to him and g the shuttles whenever they were empty. He ex- ed fully to her how he intended to use the net; first he d set it in the Sioux River as he passed by there to- ow; he knew of just the place; he would leave it there he came back from the Hallings'. Unless the cards stacked against him he would bring back a nice mess sh. . . . That, however, wasn't his great plan with the ne told her; but she mustn't say a word about this to the It was to be a big surprise for them; they were such e fellows! The fact of the matter was, he planned to . ducks with that net; that had been the real reason for uying the twine; there would be other fare than badger in this hut, he would just let her know, if the weather held a few days more!

ll at once it occurred to Beret that she had forgotten to up the windows to-night; she smiled to herself at the very. . . . What was the need of it, anyway? Cover the ows . . . what nonsense! . . . She smiled again, feel- languorous drowsiness creep over her.

r Hansa knit away on the net, chatting happily with s he worked; a confident ring of joy sounded in all he He had fastened the net to the bedpost, just as her r always had done. She listened peacefully to his n, cheerful voice, which after a while began to sound distant, like the indolent swish and gurgle of lapping n waves on a fair summer's night. Gradually she was e away on this sound, and slept the whole night through out stirring.

hen she awoke next morning Per Hansa, still fully sed, lay beside her, over against the wall; he evidently had thrown himself down to rest only a little while before Light was creeping into the room; directly in front of th bed lay a big white heap of something. . . . Those care less boys—had they thrown their clothes on the floor again . . . She stooped over to pick the clothes up and put ther on the bench; she grasped hold of the heap—and it was new net, sheeted and fully rigged, as a new net ought to be . . . Poor man!—he must have sat up all night! . . . Sh spread the quilt carefully over him.

That morning Beret took some of the precious whit flour and made a batch of pancakes. He deserved to hav one good meal before he went away again!

He left right after breakfast. Beret worked industriousl throughout the day, while many thoughts came and wen . . . It must be her destiny, this! There was One wh governed all things. . . . He knew what was best, an against His will it was useless to struggle! . . .

. . . Often that day she went to the window to loo eastward. Every time she looked, it seemed to be growin darker over there. . . .

. . . That evening she again covered the window. . . .

The Heart that Dared Not Let in the Sun

I

DURING the first days of October a few white, downy snowflakes hung quivering in the air . . . floated about . . . fell in great oscillating circles. ⁄ seemed headed for nowhere; they followed no common se; but finally they reached the ground and disappeared. ne air cleared again. There came a drowsy, sun-filled in- l . . . nothing but golden haze . . . quiet bereft of fe. . . .

ne sun had no strength these days. It peeped out in the ning, glided across the sky as before, yet life it had until toward evening, as it was nearing the western rim ne prairie. Then it awoke, grew big and blushing, took splendour which forced everyone to stop and look; the ern sky foamed and flooded with a wanton richness of ur, which ran up in streams to meet the coming night. s would walk about in the evenings speaking in low s. . . . Never in their lives had they seen such sun- . . .

. Day after day the same . . . evening after evening. ngely still the days . . . the evenings more mysteriously . How could one lift one's voice against such si- e! . . .

nen one morning—October was nearly passed—the sun l not get his eye open at all; the heavens rested close e the plain, grey, dense, and still. The chill of this ness drove through the air though no wind stirred. ple went indoors to put on more clothes, came out again, froze worse than ever. . . . Bleak, grey, God-forsaken, empty desolation stretched on every hand. . . .

Sometime in the afternoon snowflakes began to fall. The came sailing down from the north until the air was a close packed swarm of greyish-white specks, all bound in th same direction. The evening was short-lived that day, an died in a pitch-black night that weighed down the heart. . . . . Again day came, and brought no other light tha that which the greyish-white specks gave. . . . All that da the snow fell—all the next night. . . .

At last it grew light once more—but the day had no sur A cold wind howled about the huts—left them, and tor down into the white snow blanket, shaking out of it blind ing swirls. . . . The swirls vanished and reappeared—die down, flared up again and tore on. . . . New ones con stantly rose . . . many. . . .

II

Per Hansa and his boys worked like firebrands during th last days before winter set in. Every task that came t their hands delighted them; they went from one fairy tal into the next—came out again, and there was a new one a hand; they gave themselves no peace, either by night o by day. . . . But Beret could not share their mood; sh would watch them absently as they left the house; or whe they were due to return, she would wander about wit And-Ongen on her arm, looking for them through the win dow, and keeping a hot dish in readiness on the stove. The were sure to be cold, poor fellows! . . . Then when the were seated around the table, wrapped up in all their re markable experiences, the talk would jump from one incider to another, and she would find herself unable to follow i Their liveliness and loud laughter only drove her heav thoughts into a still deeper darkness.

She had to admit, however, that Per Hansa could ac complish the most marvellous things; she could not imagin where he had learned it all. . . . There were the walls, fo example, of which he himself was especially proud, an which Store-Hans never tired of admiring. He had be work on these walls immediately after he had returned n the trip east to the Hallings' with the potatoes. The had been mixed according to directions, and spread the walls—three coats of it, no less; now the sod hut ne so brightly inside that it dazzled the eyes. . . . Be-the snow came, Beret thought it delightful to have such s; but after there was nothing but whiteness outside—whiteness as far as the eye could see and the thought d reach—she regretted that he had touched them. Her were blinded wherever she looked, either outdoors or ors; the black-brown earthen floor was the only ob-on which she could rest them comfortably; and so she ys looked down now, as she sat in the house. But hint

, and thus ruin his pleasure, she could not. . . . And it y didn't matter much to her; she would endure it for brief time that remained! . . .

ne was thankful enough, though, for all the fine fish that nad brought home. Per Hansa had taken both boys him on the great expedition east to the Sioux River;
e they had made a tremendous catch with the help of the and Per Hansa had talked with the Trönders about y extraordinary things, and had gained much valuable in-nation. . . . Heaps of frozen fish now lay outside all g the wall; Per Hansa explained to her what a God-send as that the snow finally had come. Hm! Good Heavens!
t hadn't come soon he would have been obliged to go and get it! Now he was spared that trouble; with the of the snowdrifts they could have fresh fish through whole winter. . . . "Hey, woman!" he said with a laugh, never she complained of how desolate it was since the v had come. "Can't you understand that we could never age things without the snow? . . . Hey, wife—white and both outdoors and indoors! . . . Wonder if something dn't be done to the floor, too?" . . .

ow it came to light what had been working in Per sa's mind when he had bought all that salt; he salted n quantities of the fish, and packed them away in all vessels they could spare.

But in the opinion of the boys, the duck hunt with the net was the crowning adventure. Never had there been such an enthusiastic party; the father was almost the worst of the three! Now the great secret of his planning and scheming over the ducks was revealed. While Store-Hans and his brother had only talked about capturing them and wondered what could be done, Per Hansa had figured out every detail in his mind; if the ducks got the best of him on one tack he would fool them on another; into the net somehow they must go! . . . For three nights they had all stayed out in the swamps to the westward, toiling and fighting among the myriads of birds; in the morning they would come home after daylight, wet as crows, numb all over, and blue in the face with cold. But they always brought a catch! . . . As soon as the evening came they would be off again.

Each time Beret pleaded sadly, both by word and glance for them to stay at home. . . . They would wear themselves out this way. What could they possibly do with all these fowl? Just wait and see; they might not need so much food—something might happen. . . . The boys only laughed at these objections; their mother sounded just like Sofie probably all women were alike—they had no sense. Just imagine such a ridiculous idea—catch no more birds! . . . The father joined in with them and poked mild fun at the mother. How silly it would be not to grab good food when it lay right at their door! Suppose the swamps were to freeze up to-night? And after they had picked the ducks there would be fine feather beds for both herself and Little Per! . . . Per Hansa's voice softened. . . . And besides there was no more delicate fare than those ducks on any king's table! . . .

But she would not be carried along. . . . "We won't need them!" she said, dispiritedly . . . and fell into silence.

Dusk settled, the menfolk left—and she was alone with the child again.

But at last winter shut down in earnest; the swamps froze up and duck hunting came to an end for that year.

I think we ought to carry some soup meat to our neighrs," said Per Hansa. . . . "This time it'll be something er than badger stew!" . . .

very person in the little settlement had been rushed with k during the last days before Father Winter came. They ad a feeling that he wasn't very far away, that old fellow, thought it best to be well prepared to receive him. Hans , Tönseten, and the Solum boys had been east to the ux River again for wood; they had made two s, and home had seen very little of them lately. Few s had been made; everyone had been busy with his own irs. . . . For other reasons than this, visitors came but om to Per Hansa's now; there was something queer about woman in that place; she said so little; at times people that they were unwelcome there. She was apt to break suddenly with some remark that they could only wonder hey hardly knew whether to be surprised or offended.

ut on the day when the boys carried a gift of ducks to he houses in the neighbourhood, proud of the dainty l they brought, and relating what sounded like a fairy everyone went over to Per Hansa's to learn how he gone about catching these birds. For Ole and Storeis wouldn't tell, though they plied them with questions.

The Solum boys came first, with Tönseten and Kjersti l upon their heels; last of all came Hans Olsa and ine.

nce inside, they completely forgot their curiosity about duck hunting; they stood with their mouths open, lookup one wall and down the next.

. . . Why . . why . . . what in the wide world was ? Had they plastered snow on the walls? Sam thought ally was snow, and touched it gingerly with his finger.

What was it, anyway? Could it possibly be paint? . . . stars, how fine it looked! . . . Per Hansa sat there, ing his pipe and enjoying his little triumph; it seemed im that he had never liked his neighbours so well as at moment. . . . Beret went about listening quietly; in her face was a troubled expression. Not for all the world would she have had the work on the walls undone! . . .

Amazement was universal. . . . Sörine smiled in her pleasant, kindly way; she went over to Beret and said with warm sympathy:

"Now you certainly have got a fine house! . . . You'll thrive all the better for it." . . . At that, she began to help her with the work. But Kjersti, with an emphatic slap on her thigh, voiced it as her opinion that it was a dirty shame that she and Sörrina had picked up such poor sticks for husbands! Why couldn't they ever hatch up some nice scheme? Why was Per Hansa the only man among them with his head on the right end? Yes, they certainly ought to feel ashamed of themselves, sitting there! . . . Tönseten took offence at this; he felt constrained to remind her that he was the fellow who had risen to the occasion and captured the Sognings! She'd better remember that; for what would have become of them all in the long run if the Sogning hadn't joined them? . . . "And I don't exactly see what this new notion of Per Hansa's is really good for," he spluttered on. "It's getting to be so damned swell in here that pretty soon a fellow can't even spit!" . . . Tönseten looked accusingly at Beret; it was from her that Per Hansa got these stuck-up airs. She was never willing to be like plain folks, that woman! . . . The Solum boys took great delight in the white walls; this was really beautiful. When they got married they would do the very same thing!

Hans Olsa sucked his pipe and said but little. This seemed very queer to him; he turned it over and over in his mind, but couldn't solve the problem. Was this like Per Hansa, who had always confided everything to him? . . . But here he was going about doing everything alone! When he had learned how a black earthen wall could be made shining white at so small a cost, why hadn't he told the others? There was so little cheer out here; they all sorely needed to share whatever they found. . . . The big, rugged features were very sober; he had to look hard at Per Hansa. No, it was the same good-natured face that one liked so well to near by! This affair was just one of his many pranks; onger Hans Olsa gazed at his neighbour, the more ible grew this solution inside that big head of his.

while later, as the two men stood together outside the watching the falling snow, he said, quietly:
ou have made it pretty fine inside, Per Hansa; but Who is now whitening the outside of your walls does as well. . . . You shouldn't be vain in your own gth, you know!"
h, nonsense, Hans Olsa!" laughed Per Hansa. "What ou prating about? . . . Here, take along a couple more s for Sörrina!" . . .

III

was well enough that winter had come at last, thought Hansa; he really needed to lay off and rest awhile.
a good square meal of ducks or fresh fish, he would his pipe and stretch himself, saying:
a!—now we're really as well off here, my Beret-girl, ybody could ever wish to be!" . . . He did not always t an answer, and seldom got one. Then he would himself on the bed and take a good after-dinner nap, sleeping continuously on into the night. . . . Life
d very pleasant now!
this fashion he spent quite a number of days; the bad ner still held out. Per Hansa continued to do full juso the fare. When he had eaten his fill he would point gain to Beret how well off they were, and go to his n to sleep the sleep of the righteous. It was almost un-y—he could never seem to get sleep enough! He slept day and night; and still he felt the need of more
. . . Now and then he would go to the door to look t the weather, and glance across toward the neighbours.
. . nothing to do outside—the weather was too beastly!
ould come in again, and stretch himself, and yawn. . . .
e days wore on.
s, they wore on. . . One exactly like the other. . . .

Per Hansa couldn't grasp the strange contradiction that ha begun to impress him; he knew that the days were actuall growing shorter—were being shorn more closely by ever passing night; but—weren't they growing longer?

Indeed they were—no question about it! They finall grew so long that he was at a dead loss to find somethin to do with which to end them. He assured himself tha all this leisure was very fine; that he needed to ease up a bit during the fall he hadn't spared himself; now it felt like blessing to sit around and play the gentleman. Times woul be strenuous enough for him once more, when spring cam with fair weather and his great estate needed to be planted he would just lay off and rest for a while yet! . . .

The days only grew longer and longer.

In the end, this enforced idleness began to gall him. Th landscape showed a monotonous sameness . . . never th slightest change. . . . Grey sky—damp, icy cold. . . . Snow fell . . . snow flew. . . . He could only guess now wher the huts of Hans Olsa lay. There wasn't a thing to do out doors; plenty of wood lay chopped and ready for use; it too but a little while to do the chores. . . . Beyond this, every thing took care of itself outside.

Per Hansa sat by the table, or lay down on the bed whe he got tired of sitting up; tried to sleep as long as possible woke up with a start; turned over and tried to sleep again rose and sat by the table once more, when he grew weary o lying down.

The days wore on, and yet got nowhere. . . . Time ha simply come to a standstill! He had never seen the like; thi was worse than the deadest lay-up in Lofoten!

The boys were almost as badly off; they too sat restles and idle; and because they had nothing at all to occup their minds they often came to blows, so that the father ha to interfere. . . . But he was never very rough with them poor boys, what else could they find for amusement? . . The mother always reminded him of their books. . . . Yes of course—certainly they must learn to read, the father said no heathen were going to grow up in his house! He trie

e stern with them over this matter; but then . . . after boys were boys, he remembered!
t length he realized that this sort of life could not go on didn't give a hang for the weather—put on his coat and the boys do the same; then they went out and attacked woodpile. They sawed and they chopped; they lugged wood and piled it up; first they stacked up as much pped wood as they could stow in the odd corners of the se; then they built a curious little fort of chopped wood in the yard—very neatly and craftily constructed—and l it full, too; this work cheered them up and kept their ds occupied, though the weather was bitterly cold and ement. They toiled at it from early morning until late ight, and hardly took time off to eat their dinner; the s began to get sick of the job and complained of being
l. The woodpile lasted exactly four days; when they chopped up the last stick there was nothing left for n to do outside.
hen they sat idle again.
he bad spell of weather held out interminably. A cold, ing wind from the northeast blew the livelong day, and ned about the corners at night. . . . Snow flew . . .
e snow fell.
o sun. . . . No sky. . . . The air was a grey, ashen which breathed a deathly chill; it hung around and above n thick and frozen. . . . In the course of time there was ll moon at night, somewhere behind the veil. Then the grew luminous and alive—strange to behold. . . . Night night the ghostly spectacle would return.
er Hansa would gaze at it and think: Now the trolls are ly abroad! . . . .

ne evening Tönseten and Kjersti came over. They sat talked until it grew very late. One could readily see that ert was out of sorts about something; he puffed at his in glum, ill humor, glared at Per Hansa's walls, and 't have much to say. When he did speak his voice was ecessarily loud.

Kjersti and Beret sat together on the bed; they seemed to be finding a good deal to chat about.

Kjersti was in an unusually neighbourly mood; she had come over to ask if . . . well, if she couldn't do something for Beret? She had some woollen yarn at home in her chest, very soft and very fine. Would Beret be offended if she knitted a pair of socks for the little newcomer they were all awaiting? . . . It was fine yarn, the very finest! Beret must just try to imagine how lonesome she was, sitting at home all alone with that useless husband of hers—and no little newcomer to wait for! . . . She had plenty of yarn; she could easily make the socks long enough to serve as leggings, too. The work would really bring joy to her—and to Syvert, too, poor fellow, to whom no little newcomer would ever arrive!

. . . Ah, well! . . . God pity us, Syvert wasn't so bad after all—far be it from her to complain! . . . At that Kjersti happened to think of a story she had heard, about a couple who couldn't seem to get a child though they wanted one very badly. Here the story was, since they happened to be talking about such matters. . . . This wife had so little sense that she sought the aid of a witch woman, who gave her both devil's drink and beaver-geld; she rubbed herself with the stuff and drank some of it, too, but no change came that is, not until one summer when a shoal of herring came into the fjord and with it a fleet of strange fishermen. . . Alas! desire makes a hot fire, once it has been kindled! But what do you suppose?—her husband became just as fond of that child as if he had been the father of it! . . . Wasn't that a queer thing? . . . But when the boy was a year old and was on the point of being christened—well, on that very Sunday it happened, as they were sailing across the fjord that the boat capsized and the Lord took both mother and child, right there and then! He had taken away what he had refused to give in honour, and more besides. . . . There was something mysterious about such things, didn't Beret think so? And wasn't it strange that the father should have en so fond of that child? . . . Kjersti had known them th very well.

Beret listened attentively to this tale, putting in a word re and there.

Over at the table, the men had pricked up their ears as e story began; they heard it all. Per Hansa looked at vert and laughed; Syvert, in turn, glared at the wall and d, angrily:

"I should think you'd be able to find something American talk about! . . . We're through now with all that troll siness over in Norway!" . . . He got up and started to . . . .

But Per Hansa wouldn't listen to their leaving just yet; ce they had braved the weather to make a call they might well sit awhile longer. . . . "You'll have the wind astern, vert, going home! . . . Come on, sit down and behave urself!"

On another afternoon all of Hans Olsa's household came er. They stayed till dark; then they began to say that rhaps they'd better be going now—but they made no move leave. . . . Sörine had brought a gift for Beret. There d been a few bits of cloth lying around the house, for nich she could find no use; it had been rather lonesome ese days and she had needed something to do, so she had de a little article for this newcomer whom everyone was iting for! . . . At that, Sörine drew out from her ample som a child's cap, of red, white, and blue stripes, with g silk ribbons, all sewed with the greatest care. It was a autiful cap; all had to see it; there were many warm words praise. Beret received it in silence; her eyes were wet she took the cap and laid it carefully in the big chest. . . . To-night it was Beret who refused to let the visitors leave. e absolutely insisted. Such quantities of food lay outside ound the house—far more than they would ever need—at they might as well stay for supper and help to eat it! . This proposal overjoyed Per Hansa. It was the plain th, as Beret said, they had more than they needed—and there was plenty left in the Sioux River, for that matter; to-night they were going to celebrate with fresh fish for supper! . . . He went outside and brought in a generous supply of the frozen fish, which he scaled and cut up; he was in the finest of spirits—it seemed just like the good old days in Lofoten.

. . . That evening was a happy interlude for them all.

IV

. . . No, the days would not pass! . . . Why, here it was, only the middle of November! It seemed to Per Hansa, as he sat by the table puffing his pipe and following Beret around with his eyes, that many winters must have gone by already.

He found himself watching Beret very often; during the last two weeks he had discovered many things about her which he had never noticed before. Just trifles, they were, but so many of them—one thing after another. Sitting here now with nothing else to occupy his mind, he began slowly and carefully to piece together what he had observed; the result pleased him less and less as he went on adding. He tried to wave the truth aside—to deny the plain facts; he even succeeded for a while—in the beginning. . . . Goodness! nothing but trifles—things that were always likely to happen under such circumstances! . . . Oh no! There was no danger that Beret couldn't stand her watch; things would right themselves when the time came; for it was only the law of nature, which man must obey. . . . Of course she couldn't help dreading it, poor thing!

. . . Did her face seem a good deal more wasted this time—or was he mistaken? She didn't look well at all. . . . No. . . . Then why didn't she eat more? Good Heavens! she wasn't trying to save on the food? Here was everything—quantities of it: meat aplenty, and any amount of flour! . . . She should help herself, this Beret-girl of his, or he would make her dance to another tune!

One day at table he burst out with it, telling her that she ıstn't act the stranger in her own house! He made his ice sound gruff and commanding: Now she must sit and eat like a grown woman. . . . "Here, help yourself!"
. He took a big piece of fish from the platter and put on her plate; but she merely picked at it, and left the st of it lying there.

"It is hard when you have to force every mouthful down," complained.

"But look here, you've got to eat, both for yourself and—course you must eat!"

"Oh, well," she said, wearily, as she got up and left table. . . . "It doesn't matter much about the food." . . .
Lately he had also begun to notice that she lay awake greater part of the night; he always dropped off to sleep ore she did; yet she would be wide awake in the morning en he first stirred, although he was by habit an early
r. And if by chance he woke up in the night, he would almost certain to find her lying awake beside him. . . .
e night she had called him; she had been sitting up in bed, l must have been crying—her voice sounded like it. And had only wanted him to get up and see what ailed Store-ns; he had been moaning in his sleep all night, she said.
r Hansa had risen to look after the boy, and had found hing the matter, as he had expected. . . . That night he l been seriously frightened. When he had come back to down she had started crying so despairingly; he hadn't n able to make any sense of the few words he got out of
. . . . From that time on, he had been scared to show her tenderness; he had noticed that when he did so, the rs were sure to come. And that, certainly, was not good her!

As he sat through the long, long day observing his wife,
grew more and more worried about Beret, poor thing.
ery day there were new trifles to be noticed.

She, who had always been so neat and could make what-r clothes she put on look becoming, was now going about bby and unkempt; she didn't even bother to wash herself.

He realized that he had noticed it subconsciously for a long time. . . . But now he seldom saw her even wash her face. And her hair, her beautiful hair which he admired so greatly and loved to fondle when she was in good spirits, now hung down in frowsy coils. . . . Wasn't it two days since she had touched her hair? Well—that he didn't dare to mention! . . . How could he ever speak of cleanliness at all to his Beret—his Beret who was always so prim and often nagged him for being slovenly and careless about his own appearance? . . . Not that she wasn't pretty enough, just as she was, his Beret-girl; this Per Hansa told himself many times. But one day as he sat looking at her, he suddenly got up, went over to the window, and stood there gazing out; and then he said:

"I really think you ought to go and fix up your hair, Beret-girl. . . . I kind of feel that we're going to have company to-day."

She gave him a quick glance, blushed deeply, rose, and left the room. He heard her go into the stable, where she stayed a long time; he couldn't imagine what she was doing in there at that hour of the day. Her actions made him feel worried and uncertain. When she came in again he did not dare to look at her. . . . Then she began to tidy herself; she took some water and washed, loosened up her braids and combed her hair, and afterward coiled it very prettily. She gave herself plenty of time, and took careful pains. . . . At last he had to look at her; his whole self was in the gaze that he fixed upon her; he would have liked to say something kind and loving to her now. But she did not glance at him, and so he dared not speak. . . . In a little while he found an excuse to go out; passing close to her, he said in a tender, admiring voice:

"Now we've got a fine-looking lady!"

All the rest of that day he felt happier than he had been for a long while. . . . Of course his Beret-girl would be all right. . . . Indeed, she was all right, as far as that went! . . .

But . . . other days followed. Per Hansa remained idle and had nothing to do but look at his wife. He looked and lked, until he had to face the hard fact that something s wrong.

. . Had she ever been so brooding and taciturn when she s with child before? He could talk to the boys about the ture until they would be completely carried away by his ions; but whenever he tried to draw her into the conversa- n he failed completely—failed, no matter which tack he lk nor how hard he tried. He understood it clearly: it sn't because she did not want to respond—she couldn't! . The pain of it surged through him like a wave. God Heaven, had she grown so weak and helpless! . . . She sn't even able to take nourishment. . . . There Beret sat the room with them, within four paces—yet she was far, away. He spoke to her now, to her alone, but could not ke her come out of the enchanted ring that lay about her. . When he discovered this, it hurt him so that he could ve shrieked. . . .

. . Another queer thing, she was always losing the com- nest objects—completely losing them, though they were ht at hand. He had seen it happen several times with- taking much notice; but by and by it began to occur so quently that he was forced to pay attention. She would a thing down, merely turn around, and then go about rching for it in vain; and the thing would lie exactly where had placed it, all the time. . . . This happened again and in; sometimes it struck them all as very funny. . . . "It ks as if your eyes were in your way, Mother!" Store- ns once exclaimed, laughing so heartily that the others l to join in; but Per Hansa soon noticed that she was rt when they made fun of her.

One day she was looking for the scissors. She had been ting by the stove, mending a garment; had risen to put more fuel; and when she sat down again had been unable find her scissors, which she held all the while in her hand. e searched diligently, and asked the others to help her. ddenly Ole discovered the scissors in his mother's hand; ran up to her and jerked them away; the boy was roaring th laughter. . . . Then she burst into violent tears, laid her work aside, threw herself down on the bed, and buried her face in the pillow. All three menfolk felt painfully embarrassed.

And sometimes she had moments of unusual tenderness toward them all—particularly toward Per Hansa. Her concern would grow touchingly childlike; it was as if she could not do enough for him and the children. But it was a tenderness so delicate that he dared not respond to it. Nevertheless, he felt very happy when these moods came; they gave him renewed courage.

. . . Of course she would be all right again as soon as it was over! . . . And now the event could not be far away! . . .

V

Winter was ever tightening its grip. The drifting snow flew wildly under a low sky, and stirred up the whole universe into a whirling mass; it swept the plain like the giant broom of a witch, churning up a flurry so thick that people could scarcely open their eyes.

As soon as the weather cleared icy gusts drove through every chink and cranny, leaving white frost behind; people's breaths hung frozen in the air the moment it was out of the mouth; if one touched iron, a piece of skin would be torn away.

At intervals a day of bright sunshine came. Then the whole vast plain glittered with the flashing brilliance of diamonds; the glare was so strong that it burnt the sight; the eyes saw blackness where there was nothing but shining white. . . .

. . . Evenings . . . magic, still evenings, surpassing in beauty the most fantastic dreams of childhood! . . . Out to the westward—so surprisingly near—a blazing countenance sank to rest on a white couch . . . set it afire . . . kindled a radiance . . . a golden flame that flowed in many streams from horizon to horizon; the light played on the hundreds and thousands and millions of diamonds, and turned nem into glittering points of yellow and red, green and lue fire.

. . . Such evenings were dangerous for all life. To the rong they brought reckless laughter—for who had ever seen uch moon-nights? . . . To the weak they brought tears, opeless tears. This was not life, but eternity itself. . . .

Per Hansa sat in his hut, ate, drank, puffed at his pipe, nd followed his wife with his eyes in vague alarm; for the ffe of him he didn't know what to do. Where could he be- ake himself? It wouldn't do for him to go from house to ouse, when things were in such a bad way at home. . . . o, here he was condemned to sit! . . . His temper was rowing steadily worse; he found it more and more difficult o keep his hands off things.

He would be seized by a sudden, almost irresistible de- re to take Beret, his own blessed Beret, hold her on his nee like a naughty child—just make her sit there—and eason with her . . . talk some sense into her!

For this wasn't altogether fair play on her part! Of ourse it was hard for her these days; but after all, the time ould soon come to an end; and that was something real to ruggle with—something to glory in! Besides, she had her onted round of duties to perform. . . . But he! . . . Here e was forced to sit in idleness, and just let his eyes wan- er! . . .

. . . And it wasn't right for him to feel this way, either; ut the endless waiting had at last got on his nerves. . . . trange, how long it took! Hadn't the time ought to be rawing near pretty soon? . . . During these days he often nought about the matter of a name. He immediately de- ided that if it turned out to be a girl, she should be named eret; that part of it was settled. But suppose she bore him boy? In that case he wasn't so certain. Two boy's names ere running in his mind, but—well, time would tell. . . . f she would only hurry up and bring forth the child, he ould guarantee to find a suitable name for it!

He began to feel weak and miserable as he dragged him- elf about the house. . . . Then, one day, came a fascinating thought: if he could only make a short trip east to the Sioux River, to visit the Trönders! This spell of cold weather was nothing to mind; it was a long way, to be sure, but he felt that he could easily manage it. Hadn't he sailed a cockleshell of an eight-oared boat all the way from Helgeland to West Lofoten in the dark of winter? This would be mere child's play compared to that journey. . . . What great sport it would be to fish with a net through the ice! From the Trönders, who were old settlers in this region, he could get a lot more valuable information; it was really remarkable, what they had told him last time, about the fur trade with the Indians north at Flandreau. . . . Whenever the thought of this journey came to him he could hardly push it aside.

. . . Useless even to dream of such a thing! Here was poor Beret, pottering helplessly about—he must think only of her.

And Per Hansa tried his best to think of her to some effect. He had noticed that she minded the cold; she never complained, but he was well aware of it; from now on he tended the fire himself and kept the stove red hot most of the day. In spite of that he couldn't get the house properly warm when the cold was at its worst; the earthen floor was always cold and Beret's feet seemed particularly sensitive.

One day Per Hansa got an idea which gave him much diversion. While they had been busy chopping the wood he had selected a few of the largest and straightest-grained sticks, trimmed them out square, and stood them behind the stove to dry; he had promised himself that he would make something out of them during the winter. Now he chose the best piece he could pick out; he had decided to make a pair of clogs for Beret; he knew by experience that such shoes were very warm while they were new. For a long while he couldn't think of any material to use for the vamps; then he resolutely cut off a corner of the old sheepskin robe which they used on their bed; he sheared the wool snug, and made the vamps of that. . . . He did a neat, attractive job and felt rather proud when the job was finished.

He brought the clogs to Beret and put them on her feet

It was plain to be seen that she was touched by the gift; t then she said something that he wished she had left unoken:

"You might have thought of this before, it seems to me. ere I have gone with cold feet all winter." . . . The words ere uttered quietly; she meant no reproach by them, but erely said what came into her mind.

He turned away and went out of the house; outside the or he paused, and stood for a long time gazing off into the ening. . . . Somewhere out there life was still happy. . . . here was no solitude. . . . Didn't it seem to call to him?

Per Hansa felt that now he needed to cry. . . .

VI

A day came when Per Hansa flared up in a rage that ightened even himself; he struck out blindly and smashed natever happened to lie within his reach. It was one of e Solum boys that brought it about. One forenoon Henry me over and sat chatting for a long while, as if he had thing in particular on his mind; Per Hansa was glad of e visit, and urged Henry to stay. When the lad finally se to go he asked if Per Hansa would be willing to keep eir cow until the time of the spring planting; he could ve the calf she would drop in January, so he would be thing out; and there was plenty of hay left in their barn, hich could be hauled over . . . Henry spoke slowly, without oking up; he seemed almost ashamed to explain his errand.

Per Hansa's eyes blinked fast. . . . This was indeed ndsome of Henry; imagine his thinking more of Beret d the children than of himself! In fact, it was so generous, d handsomely done, that Per Hansa felt quite overcome; s eyes blinked till they watered. . . . But he mustn't take offer like this! True enough, Rosie was drying up and ilk wasn't very plentiful in their house; but they had arned to get along without it; they made plenty of soup, d that filled the same need. No, it would never do to take the milk away from the Solum boys. . . . "I don't very well see how I can take your cow," Per Hansa answered.

Henry seemed perplexed, looked down at the floor, and apparently did not know how to go on.

—Well, that wasn't exactly the idea, he said. . . . He and his brother had made a sleigh, and now they wanted to try it out. The cow couldn't be left alone after they were gone.

Per Hansa's eyes fairly danced; he leaned across the table, speaking fast and eagerly: The devil you say—going east to the Sioux River, perhaps? . . . What? . . . He wished to the Lord he could go along with them! Couldn't they hold up for just a little while—until he got ready? . . . He threw a swift glance at his wife.

—No, that wasn't exactly the idea, either, Henry confessed, still more embarrassed. Their parents were sitting alone, back there in Minnesota; he and Sam had agreed that they had better go east and celebrate Christmas with the old folks. They had been getting pretty lonesome here, anyway; there seemed to be nothing to do in the dead of winter; but they fully intended to come back in the spring, as soon as the prairie was open. . . . Couldn't he do them the favour of keeping the cow?

For an instant all the light seemed to die out of Per Hansa's face: then it suddenly flared up again in a flame of rage that positively snapped and crackled. .

"Take your damned old cow along with you, Henry! We want none of your milk!" . . . His lips trembled like those of one on the point of bursting into tears.

—Well—said Henry, calmly—if that was the way Per Hansa felt about it, he would have to ask some of the others; he certainly didn't want to force the cow on anyone! If they could find no other way out of it, they would have to slaughter the beast; they couldn't possibly take her with them. . . . Without further words he left the house.

It was then that the storm broke loose in earnest. . . . The boys were sitting at the table, each with a piece of arcoal, drawing ponies and Indians on top; those of Store-ans's were waging war against Ole's; the boys were so ken up with their play that they hardly noticed what was ing on in the room. Beret sat by the stove, mending a rment; the child had also been given needle and thread, d was industriously sewing away at a piece of rag. . . . r Hansa stood at the window, glaring out.

All at once Beret remarked in her quiet manner, without oking up, that it didn't seem a bit strange to her that the lum boys wanted to leave the place. Why should they exiled out here in the wilderness?

It was as if something had suddenly stung Per Hansa; wheeled quickly and looked at his wife, his eyes hard d glazed.

"Hell!" he snapped . . . "If they were men, instead of ch god-damned lousy worms, they would find something do!" . . . Quiet fell on the room after this outburst; r Hansa sank down heavily on the edge of the bench. . . . l of a sudden he burst out again:

—Ha—do! . . . Two strong men! Here lay the finest ighing that one could wish for! If they had been grown- men, and not a couple of babies, they would now be uling home logs for their new house! . . . If he didn't ve to sit here like a sick woman, he would have had ough lumber on hand for the finest farmstead, long ago perhaps would have started to build by now! Did she tually believe there was nothing to do around here? . .

His words cut through the little room like the harsh grat-g of a file on a saw blade.

Again there was silence. He got up savagely and stuck s pipe in his mouth, but did not light it; he did not know hat he was doing now. . . .

It was Beret who broke the silence; although her question as uttered very calmly, it seemed to cut deeper than his olent outburst:

—Well, why didn't he go to work and do it, then?

Go to work?—he snarled.—Did she need to ask why he wasn't doing anything? Was she in such a condition that he could ever leave the house? . . .

—Oh, she was in the condition he had brought her to—no worse and no better—she said. Now her words, too, vibrated with passion.—No, indeed, he didn't need to sit at home on her account! she added sharply.

Per Hansa drove his fist into the table with a terrible crash. The boys jumped up in fright and shrank away—never had they seen their father like this; he looked as if he would strike their mother the next instant. Little And-Ongen threw the rag in her mother's lap, put her hand into her mouth, and screamed in terror.

"You talk like a fool! . . . That only shows how much sense you've got!"

He saw a cap over on a wall somewhere, seized it, found the door, and was gone. . . .

Per Hansa stayed outside nearly all of the day. Before evening had come, however, he had made a pair of skis for each of the boys: they were rather heavy and clumsy affairs, but would serve the purpose; the boys stood looking at them wide-eyed and happy—but still they hardly dared to come near their father. . . . When he finally entered the house that evening the supper stood ready on the table. . . . Beret had gone to bed.

As soon as he had eaten he told the boys that he would have to go on an errand over to Hans Olsa's; he wasn't sure when he would be back; if he stayed late, they must go to bed. . . . No, they couldn't go with him! . . . He gave a glance toward the bed as he went out. . . .

When he reached Hans Olsa's house he asked at once if he might speak to Sörine alone; he seemed bashful and embarrassed—tried to assume a bantering air, but didn't quite succeed. When Sörine had stepped outside with him he asked beseechingly if she would be kind enough to go over and look after Beret—the sooner the better!

—Was there anything going on? Sörine asked.

—No, not exactly that—though it must be nearly time

w. But Sörine ought to remember that it was pretty nesome for her, sitting there alone, unable even to go tside the door. Day after day Beret neither saw nor heard other person, outside of the family!

—Yes, certainly—she would be glad to run over!

—Could she go right away?

—Was there such an awful hurry?—Sörine still suspected er Hansa's denial. If that was the case, he had better and get Kjersti at once; she didn't care to tackle this b alone!

—No, no—it wasn't that!

Sörine went in for a moment to put on her coat; soon e came out again, ready to start. He went with her for me distance. . . .

—Wasn't he coming along?—she asked, stopping to look quiringly at him.

—No, he guessed he wouldn't; he needed to have a little lk with Hans Olsa to-night. He only wanted to say this: at she who understood all such things so capably, must ok well to Beret now; she mustn't come away and leave r too soon!

Sörine's kind, intelligent face looked straight into his.

"I can see that you're worried about your wife to-night, er Hansa. . . . That's fine of you, I say!"

"God richly bless you for those words, Sörrina!"

Per Hansa suddenly felt like a new person; and yet he cked the courage to look up.

"But let me tell you one thing, Sörrina: I'm not half worried about my wife as I am about myself! To-day nearly laid hands on her—that's how fine I am, and w you know it! . . . Hurry along!"

"You ought to have a whaling for that, Per Hansa!" e said with a laugh, but immediately grew serious. . . . Alas! life lays a hard hand on all of us! . . . Well, now n off. You don't need to hurry to-night—if we need you, l send Ola."

Per Hansa stood there in the darkness of the winter night, oking after the disappearing figure. . . . No, her equal was not to be found! She could be both minister and father confessor, that woman!

VII

He had barely entered Hans Olsa's house, found a seat, and lighted his pipe, when another visitor arrived. Tönseten came in, apparently in a bad humour; no, he didn't want to sit down; he was going farther on in a minute or two. Did they know that the Solum boys were about to leave?

"I guess we know as much as you do," said Per Hansa, dryly. . . . "There's such a lot going on around here these days!"

"But this won't do, folks, I tell you—it simply won't do! As Kjersti says, soon we'll have nothing but the snow left!"

"And I hope that'll go in time, too," laughed Per Hansa.

"It probably will!" Tönseten snapped, irritably. "But what I don't understand is, why have you folks let things come to such a pass?"

"We . . . ?" Per Hansa asked.

"Yes, you! . . . The two of you!"

"We can't very well tie up the boys, when they are bent on going," said Hans Olsa.

"I didn't say we could!" . . . Tönseten stood in front of him, waving his arms excitedly. "But we can use common sense, can't we?"

"Very well, Syvert, let's hear your common sense," spoke up Per Hansa.

"You talk like a fool, Per Hansa! Here you both sit around and twiddle your thumbs, doing nothing; but you've got cubs, and will soon have more! Why don't you join forces and hire Henry Solum to teach school for your brats this winter? There's a good enough head on Henry's shoulders, let me tell you; he hasn't had much schooling, to be sure; but the boy was born and raised in this country, and can sling the English like a native—that much I know. . . . I haven't any brats of my own to send; but I'll gladly iip in a few dollars when my wheat is threshed next fall!" . . Tönseten seemed to have the details fully laid out, as tual.

The other two listened in silence. The eyes of Per Hansa gan to shoot rapid, sparkling glances, which always be-ayed the fact that he was in good humour; but it was some me before he opened his mouth. Hans Olsa sat ponder-g over the new idea that had just been proposed; it was rfectly true that the children needed schooling; but how d this bear on the case, when the Solum boys were ready d determined to go?

"I see you're still hesitating!" Tönseten exclaimed, snap-shly. "Listen here, now: we're all going straight over to e Solum boys and talk them into it right away!"

"It strikes me this way," said Hans Olsa, slowly. "If ey have made up their minds, it isn't right for us to inter-re."

"Made up their minds!" snorted Tönseten, contemptuously. What nonsense you're talking, Hans Olsa! How many nes have you made up your mind, I'd like to know, and en unmade it again? . . . I can assure you of one thing, llows: if we let Sam and Henry slip away from us now, s certainly doubtful if we ever see them again—single and hitched as they are! That's just Kjersti's opinion, too. nen won't we be left in a fine mess, I ask you—for what ance would we stand of ever getting such good neigh-urs again?"

"We might try it," Hans Olsa conceded. "What do you ink, Per Hansa?"

Per Hansa jumped up from his chair. "I'll do whatever u say, friends. We can get no worse than a refusal." . . . ut then he remembered something, and hesitated for a mo-ent. . . . "I really oughtn't to be going over there; but—oh, ell! who cares!" He grabbed up his cap impulsively. . . . might as well give Henry a chance to tell me what he inks of me! . . . The sooner, the better!"

They held a lengthy conference with the Solum boys that ght. Outside of their hut the sleigh waited in readiness;

inside the door the chest stood packed; the boys were on the point of going to bed when the three men entered, and were evidently annoyed to see them. . . . The newcomers seemed unaccountably bashful.

Hans Olsa announced their errand.

At this Henry burst out laughing. . . . No, a school-teacher he could never be, he said; he had other things to think of; back east in Minnesota somewhere, a girl was straying about looking for him; if he could only find her, he too would be needing a teacher by and by! . . .

Then Tönseten began to talk; there was a note in his voice that put all joking aside, even though they had to laugh at him now and then:

"If you leave this place, you'll have to take Kjersti and me along with you, though I don't know what we would do with ourselves back in Minnesota! She and I crossed the Red Sea, as it were, when we left last spring. . . . For her and me there is no road leading back! . . . What do you think we're going to do, I'd like to know, when you are gone? At Hans Olsa's they don't play cards; and Per Hansa, poor devil—well, he has a sick woman on his hands. . . . God alone knows how that business is going to come off. That's just what Kjersti says, too!"

Per Hansa had been silent ever since he came in; now he knocked the ashes out of his pipe, rose from the chest, and turned to Henry:

"I'll tell you exactly how we stand—and this is gospel truth. If you and Sam leave us now, it'll be so dull and dreary for the rest of us that we might as well hang ourselves. You saw how I went to pieces to-day? You came and made me the finest kind of an offer, and in return I flew right in your face; you know blamed well, Henry, that such is not my way." . . . Here he paused for a moment, and then went on: "What sort of a school-teacher you'll make I haven't the faintest idea; I only know this, that you and your brother are both fine fellows and that none of us can afford to lose you. . . . Now, go ahead and do as your heart bids!"

Per Hansa had spoken with forced calmness; the seriousss of the situation bore in upon them all. Everyone in the m had the same thought: this strong man was likely at minute to burst into tears.

. . A long silence fell. Tönseten blew his nose violently ween his fingers, after which he wiped them off on his users.

At last Henry spoke—his voice was husky and subdued: "It's harder on us than it is on you. We have only each er: but you have wives and children to squabble with!"

"Children!" cried Tönseten, wiping his eyes. . . . "Good d! what are you saying, Henry?" . . .

"Well, all the same," Henry continued, earnestly, "if you l undertake to give us supper, one week with each of you, l have our clothes mended, we'll try to hang on a little ile. . . . What do you say, Sam?"

VIII

The days wore on . . . sunny days . . . bleak, gloomy s, with cold that congealed all life.

There was one who heeded not the light of the day, whether night be grey or golden. Beret stared at the earthen floor the hut and saw only night round about her.

Yes . . . she faced only darkness. She tried hard, but could not let in the sun.

Ever since she had come out here a grim conviction had en taking stronger and stronger hold on her.

This was her retribution!

Now had fallen the punishment which the Lord God had ted out to her; at last His visitation had found her out l she must drink the cup of his wrath. Far away she had l, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof . so it had seemed to her . . . but the arm of His might l reached farther still. No, she could not escape—this s her retribution!

The stillness out here had given her full opportunity for reflection; all the fall she had done nothing but brood and remember. . . . Alas! she had much to remember!

She had accepted the hand of Per Hansa because she must—although no law had compelled her; she and he were the only people who had willed it thus. She had been gotten with child by him out of wedlock; nevertheless, no one had compelled her to marry him—neither father, nor mother, nor anyone in authority. It had been wholly her own doing. Her parents, in fact, had set themselves against the marriage with all their might, even after the child, Ole, had come. . . . It had mattered nothing at all what they had said, nor what anyone else had said; for her there had been no other person in the world but Per Hansa! Whenever she had been with him she had forgotten the admonitions and prayers of her father and mother. . . . He had been life itself to her; without him there had been nothing. . . . Therefore she had given herself to him, although she had known it was a sin—had continued to give herself freely, in a spirit of abandoned joy.

Now she found plenty of time to remember how her parents had begged and threatened her to break with him; she recalled all that they had said, turning it over in her mind and examining it minutely. . . . Per Hansa was a shiftless fellow, they had told her; he drank; he fought; he was wild and reckless; he got himself tangled up in all sorts of brawls; no honourable woman could be happy with such a man. He probably had affairs with other women, too, whenever he had a chance. . . . All the other accusations she knew to be true; but not the last—no, not the last! She alone among women held his heart. The certainty of this fact had been the very sweetness of life to her. . . . What did she care for the rest of it! All was as nothing compared with this great certainty. . . . Ah, no—she knew it well enough: for him she was the only princess!

But now she understood clearly all that her parents had done to end it between them, and all the sacrifices they had been willing to make; she had not realized it at the time. . . . Oh, those kind-hearted parents on whom she had turned back in order that she might cleave to him: how they st have suffered! The life which she and he had begotten common guilt they had offered to take as their own, give heir name and their inheritance, and bring it up as their y child. They had freely offered to use their hard-earned ings to send her away from the scene of her shame . . . recious had she been to them! But she had only said no, l no, and no, to all their offers of sacrifice and love! . . . d there ever been a transgression so grievous as hers!

. . Yet how could she ever have broken with him? here Per Hansa was, there dwelt high summer and there loomed for her. How can a human forsake his very ? . . . Whenever she heard of one of his desperately kless cruises through rough and stormy seas, on which had played with the lives of his comrades as well as his n, her cheeks would glow and her heart would flame. This s the man her heart had chosen—this was he, and he alone! oice would sing within her. Or when she sat among the ther on the mountain side in the fair summer night, and came to her and laid his head in her lap—the tousled head t only she could lull to sleep—then she felt that now she s crossing the very threshold of paradise! . . . Though had had a thousand lives, she would have thrown them away for one such moment—and would have been glad the bargain! . . .

. . Yes, she remembered all that had happened in those s; it was so still out here . . . so easy to remember! No one had ever told her, but she knew full well who was that had persuaded Hans Olsa to leave the land and ancient farm that had been in his family for genera-ns, and go to America. There had been only one other rson in the world whom Per Hansa loved, and that was ns Olsa. She had been jealous of Hans Olsa because of s; it had seemed to her that he took something that right-lly belonged to her. She had even felt the same way to-rd Sörine, who was kindness itself; on this account she d not been able to hold her friendship as fully as she eded to, either in Norway or here. . . .

. . . But when Per Hansa had come home from Lofoten that spring and announced in his reckless, masterful way that he was off for America: would Beret come now, or wait until later? . . . Well, there hadn't been a "no" in her mouth then! There she had sat, with three children in a nice little home which, after the manner of simple folk, they had managed to build. . . . But she had risen up, taken the children with her, and left it all as if nothing mattered but him!

. . . How her mother had wept at that time! . . . How her father had grieved when they had left! Time after time he had come begging to Per Hansa, offering him all that he had—boat and fishing outfit, house and farm—if only he would settle down in Norway and not take their daughter from them forever. . . . But Per Hansa had laughed it all aside! There had been a power in his unflinching determination which had sent hot waves through her. She must have led a double life at that time; she had been sad with her parents but had rejoiced with Per Hansa. He had raged like a storm through those days, wild and reckless—and sometimes ruthless, too. . . . No!—he had cried—they would just make that little trip across the ocean! America—that's the country where a poor devil can get ahead! Besides, it was only a little way; if they didn't like it, they could drift back on the first fair western breeze! . . . So they had sold off everything that they had won with so much toil, had left it all like a pair of worn-out shoes—parents, home, fatherland, and people. . . . And she had done it gladly, even rejoicingly! . . . Was there ever a sin like hers?

IX

. . . Then she had arrived in America. The country did not at all come up to her expectations; here, too, she saw enough of poverty and grinding toil. What did it avail that the rich soil lay in endless stretches? More than ever did she realize that "man liveth not by bread alone!" . . . Even the bread was none too plentiful at times. . . .

ıe Heart that Dared Not Let in the Sun

Beyond a doubt, it was Destiny that had brought her ther. . . . Destiny, the inexorable law of life, which the rd God from eternity had laid down for every human ng, according to the path He knew would be taken. . . . w punishment stood here awaiting her—the punishment having broken God's commandment of filial obedience. . Throughout the fall she had been reckoning up her re, and it came out exactly thus: Destiny had so arranged rything that the punishment should strike her all the e inevitably. Destiny had cast her into the arms of Per nsa—and she did not regret it! Destiny had held up erica as an enticing will-o'-the-wisp—and they had fol-ed! . . .

But no sooner had they reached America than the west-er had smitten the old settlements like a plague. Such a ng had never happened before in the history of mankind; ple were intoxicated by bewildering visions; they spoke edly, as though under the force of a spell. . . . "Go west! . Go west, folks! . . . The farther west, the better the d!" . . . Men beheld in feverish dreams the endless ns, teeming with fruitfulness, glowing, out there where sank into night—a Beulah Land of corn and wine! . . . e had never dreamed that the good Lord would let such y loose among men. Were it only the young people who been caught by the plague, she would not have wondered; the old had been taken even worse. . . . "Now we're nd west!" said the young. . . . "Wait a minute—we're ng along with you!" cried the old, and followed after. . Human beings gathered together, in small companies large—took whatever was movable along, and left the homestead without as much as a sigh! Ever westward the course, to where the sun glowed in matchless glory it sank at night; people drifted about in a sort of de-um, like sea birds in mating time; then they flew toward sunset, in small flocks and large—always toward Sunset nd. . . . Now she saw it clearly: here on the trackless ins, the thousand-year-old hunger of the poor after hu-n happiness had been unloosed!

Into this feverish atmosphere they had come. Could Destiny have spun his web more cunningly? She remembered well how the eyes of Per Hansa had immediately begun to gleam and glow! . . . And the strange thing about this spell had been that he had become so very kind under it. How playfully affectionate he had grown toward her during the last winter and spring! It had been even more deliciously sweet to give herself to him then, than back in those days when she had first won him. Was it not worth all the care and sorrow in the world to taste such bliss, she had often asked herself—but had been unable to answer. But—then it had happened: this spring she had been gotten with child again. . . . Let no one tell her that this was not Destiny!

She had urged against this last journey; she had argued that they must tarry where they were until she had borne the child. One year more or less would make no difference, considering all the land there was in the west. . . . Hans Olsa, however, had been ready to start; and so there had been no use in trying to hold back Per Hansa. All her misgiving he had turned to sport and laughter, or playful love; he had embraced her, danced around with her, and become so roguish that she had been forced to laugh with him. . . . "Come here, Litagod—now we're gone!" . . . She well recalled how lovely this endearing term had sounded in her ears, the first night he had used it. . . .

But this was clear to her beyond a doubt: Per Hansa was without blame in what had happened—all the blame was hers. . . . He had never been so tender toward her as in the days since they had come out here; she could not have thought it possible for one human being to have such strong desire for another as he held. . . . Who could match him—who dared follow where he led? She remembered all that he had wrought since they had set out on their journey last spring, and felt that no one else could do it after him. He was like the north wind that sweeps the cloud banks from the heavens! . . . At these thoughts, something unspeakably soft and loving came into Beret's eyes. . . . No, not like the north wind: like the gentle breeze of a summer's night—t's how he was! . . . And this, too, was only retribuı! She had bound herself inseparably to this man; now was but a hindrance to him, like chains around his feet;

ı, whom she loved unto madness, she burdened and im-ed . . . she was only in his way!

. . But that he could not understand it—that he could fathom the source of her trouble; that seemed wholly ɔmprehensible to her. Didn't he realize that she could er be like him? . . . No one in all the world was like ı! How could she be? . . .

x

Beret struggled with many thoughts these days.

. . Wasn't it remarkable how ingeniously Destiny had anged it all? For ten long years he had cast her about : a chip on the current, and then had finally washed her ore here. Here, far off in the great stillness, where there s nothing to hide behind—here the punishment would ! . . . Could a better place have been found in which to her low?

. . Life was drawing to a close. One fact stood before constantly: she would never rise again from the bed in ich she was soon to lie down. . . . This was the end.

. . Often, now, she found herself thinking of the ırchyard at home. . . . It would have been so pleasant lie down there. . . . The churchyard was enclosed by massive stone wall, broad and heavy; one couldn't ıgine anything more reliable than that wall. She had on it often in the years when she was still her father's le girl. . . . In the midst of the churchyard lay the ırch, securely protecting everything round about. No fear l ever dwelt in that place; she could well remember how boys used to jump over the graves; it had been great fun, —at times she had joined the game. . . . Within that ll many of her dear ones slumbered: two brothers whom
: had never seen, and a little sister that she remembered quite clearly, though she had died long, long ago; her grand parents, on both her father's and her mother's side, also rested here, and one of her great-grandfathers. She knew where all these graves lay. Her whole family, generation after generation, rested there—many more than she had any knowledge of. . . . Around the churchyard stood a row of venerable trees, looking silently down on the peace and the stillness within. . . . They gave such good shelter, those old trees!

. . . She could not imagine where he would bury her out here. . . . Now, in the dead of winter—the ground froze hard! . . . How would he go about it? . . . If he would only dig deep down . . . the wolves gave such unearthly howls at night! No matter what he thought of it, she would have to speak to him about the grave. . . . Well, no need to mention it just now.

One day when Beret had to go out she stayed longer than usual. Before she finally came back to the house she went to the spot where the woodpile had stood, visited the curious little fort which they had built of chopped wood, and then entered the stable. . . . It worried her to know where he would find material for a coffin. She had looked everywhere outside, but had discovered only a few bits of plank and the box in which he had mixed the lime. . . . Hadn't she better remind him of this at once? Then perhaps he could go to the Trönders, east on the Sioux River, and get some lumber from them. . . . Never mind, she wouldn't do anything about it for a few days yet.

. . . If he could only spare her the big chest! . . . Beret fell to looking at it, and grew easier in her mind. . . . That chest had belonged to her great-grandfather, but it must have been in the family long before his day; on it she could make out only the words "Anno 16—" . . . the rest was completely worn away. Along the edges and running twice around the middle were heavy iron bands. . . . Beret would go about looking at the chest—would lift the lid and gaze down inside. . . . Plenty of room in there, if they would

y put something under her head and back! She felt as she could sleep safely in that bed. She would have to to Sörine about all these matters. . . . One day Beret an to empty the chest; she got Per Hansa to make a ll cupboard out of the mortar box, and put all the things there; but she took great care not to do this while he s around.

She realized now the great forethought he had shown last mmer in building the house and stable under one roof. ey undoubtedly had the warmest house in the neighbourod; and then she enjoyed the company of the animals as lay awake at night; it felt so cosy and secure to lie there ll listen to them. . . . She could easily distinguish each mal by its particular manner of breathing and lying down. e oxen were always the last to finish munching; Rosie s the first to go to sleep; Injun's habits were entirely difent from those of the others; he moved softly, almost hout noise, as if engaged in some secret business. She er could hear him, except when the howl of a wolf nded near by; then he would snort and stamp his feet. was probably the wild blood in him that made him so erent! . . . Beret had learned to love the pony.

When she was not listening to the animals she had other ngs to occupy her mind. . . . As a little girl, she had en been taken into bed by her grandmother. This grandther had been a kindly woman, sunny and always happy, spite of her great age; each night before going to sleep e would repeat to herself pious little verses from memory. ret could not remember them all now; but she managed patch them together little by little, inserting new lines her own, and repeating them over and over to herself. is she would do for hours at a time, occasionally sitting in bed to say the verses aloud:

"Thy heavy wrath avert
From me, a wretched sinner;
Thy blissful mercy grant,
Father of love eternal!

"My sins are as many
As dust in the rays of the sun,
And as sands on the shore of the sea—
If by Thee requited,
I must sink benighted.

"Look with pity,
Tender Saviour,
At my wretched state!
Wounds of sin are burning;
May Thy hands, in love returning,
Heal my stinging stripes!

"Weighed by guilt I weary wander
In the desert here below;
When I measure
My transgressions,
Breaches of Thy holy law,
I must ponder
Oft, and wonder;
Canst Thou grace on me bestow?

"Gentle Saviour,
Cast my burden
Deep into the mercy-sea!
Blessed Jesus,
Mild Redeemer,
Thou Who gav'st Thy life for me!"

XI

The day before Christmas Eve snow fell. It fell all tha night and the following forenoon. . . . Still weather, an dry, powdery snow. . . . Murk without, and leaden dusk i the huts. People sat oppressed in the sombre gloom.

. . . Things were in a bad way over at Per Hansa's now everyone knew it and feared what might befall both Bere and him. . . . No one could help; all that could be done wa to bide the time; for soon a change must come!

"Listen, folks," said Tönseten, trying to comfort them a

: he could. "Beret can't keep this up forever! I think had better go over to her again, Kjersti!"

:oth neighbour women were now taking turns at staying n her, each one a day at a time. They saw clearly that Hansa was more in need of help than Beret; there was helping her now, while something, at least, could be done him and the children. Christmas would soon be here, and the house ought to be made comfortable and cosy! hey all felt very sorry for Per Hansa. He walked about a ragged stray dog; his eyes burned with a hunted look. :h day, the children were sent over to Hans Olsa's to stay a while; if they remained longer than they had been told, made no protest; at last they formed the habit of staying whole day. He did not realize that it was bad for Beret e without them so much; he tried to keep the talk going nself, but she had little to say; she answered in monosylla-s and had grown peculiarly quiet and distant. In the dow of a faint smile which she occasionally gave him re lay a melancholy deeper than the dusk of the Arctic on a rainy, grey fall evening.

About noon of Christmas Eve the air suddenly cleared. invisible fan was pushed in under the thick, heavy cur-n that hung trembling between earth and heaven—made a nt sweep, and revealed the open, blue sky overhead. The n shone down with powerful beams, and started a slight ckling from the eaves. Toward evening, it built a golden ry castle for itself out yonder, just beyond Indian Hill.

The children were at Hans Olsa's; And-Ongen wanted to y outside and watch the sunset. Sofie had told her t to-day was Christmas Eve, and that on every Christmas sus came down from heaven. The child asked many ques-ns. . . . Would he come driving? Couldn't they lend n the pony? . . . Sofie hardly thought so—he probably uld be driving an angel-pony!

Store-Hans, who was listening to them, thought this very y and just like girls. He knew better! . . . Toward eve-ng he suddenly wanted to go home, and was almost beside nself when his godfather said that he couldn't: all the children were to stay with Sofie to-night. They had hold him back by force. . . . This was Christmas Eve. .

He understood very well that something was about to wrong at home. Why had his mother looked so wan a worn of late, and his father acted so queer that one could talk to him?

That afternoon Beret was in childbed. . . . The gr struggle marked Per Hansa for life; he had fought his w through many a hard fight, but they had all been as nothi compared with this. He had ridden the frail keel of capsized boat on the Lofoten seas, had seen the huge, com ing waves snatch away his comrades one by one, and h rejoiced in the thought that the end would soon come f him also; but things of that sort had been mere child's pl
. . . This was the uttermost darkness. Here was neith beginning nor end—only an awful void in which he grop alone. . . .

Sörine and Kjersti had both arrived a long time sin
When they had come he had put on his coat and gone outsid but he hadn't been able to tear himself many steps aw from the house.

Now it was evening; he had wandered into the stable milk Rosie, forgetting that she had gone dry long ago;
had tended to Injun and the oxen, without knowing what was about. . . . He listened to Beret wailing in the oth room, and his heart shrivelled; thus a weak human bei could not continue to suffer, and yet live. . . . And this w his own Beret!

He stood in the door of the stable, completely undo Just then Kjersti ran out to find him; he must come in once; Beret was asking for him! . . . Kjersti was gone a flash. . . . He entered the house, took off his outdo clothes, and washed his hands. . . .

. . . Beret sat half dressed on the edge of the bed.
looked at her, and thought that he had never seen su terror on any face. . . . God in heaven—this was beyo human endurance!

She was fully rational, and asked the neighbour women

e the room for a moment, as she had something to say er husband. She spoke with great composure; they ed immediately. When the door closed behind them t rose and came over to him, her face distorted. She a hand on each of his shoulders, and looked deep into yes, then clasped her hands behind his neck and pulled violently toward her. Putting his arms firmly around he lifted her up gently and carried her to the bed; there aid her down. He started to pull the covers over her.
But she held on to him; his solicitous care she heeded at all.

hen he had freed himself, she spoke brokenly, between
s:

. . "To-night I am leaving you. . . . Yes, I must leave
. . . I know this is the end! The Lord has found me because of my sins. . . . It is written, 'To fall into the lls of the living God!' . . . Oh!—it is terrible! . . . I t see how you will get along when you are left alone . . .
gh I have only been a burden to you lately. . . . You better give And-Ongen to Kjersti . . . she wants a l so badly—she is a kind woman. . . . You must take oys with you—and go away from here! . . . How lone-e it will be for me . . . to lie here all alone!"

ears came to her eyes, but she did not weep; between ns she went on strongly and collectedly:

But promise me one thing: put me away in the big t! . . I have emptied it and made it ready. . . .
nise to lay me away in the big chest, Per Hansa! . . .
you must be sure to dig the grave deep! . . . You n't heard how terribly the wolves howl at night! . . .
nise to take plenty of time and dig deep down—do you
!"

is wife's request cut Per Hansa's heart like sharp ice; hrew himself on his knees beside the bed and wiped the perspiration from her face with a shaking hand.

. . "There now, blessed Beret-girl of mine!" . . . His ds sounded far off—a note of frenzy in them. . . .

"Can't you understand that this will soon be over? . . To-morrow you'll be as chipper as a lark again!"

Her terror tore her only the worse. Without heeding h words, she spoke with great force out of the clearness o her vision:

"I shall die to-night. . . . Take the big chest! . . . A first I thought of asking you not to go away when spri came . . . and leave me here alone. . . . But that would a sin! . . . I tell you, you must go! . . . Leave as soon spring comes! Human beings cannot exist here! . . They grow into beasts. . . ."

The throes were tearing her so violently now that sh could say no more. But when she saw him rise she made great effort and sat up in bed.

. . . "Oh!—don't leave me!—don't go away! . . . Can you see how sorely I need you? . . . And now I shall di . . . Love me—oh, do love me once more, Per Hansa . . . She leaned her body toward him. . . . "You must g back to Norway. . . . Take the children with you . . . l them grow up there. Ask father and mother to forgive m . . . Tell father that I am lying in the big chest! . . . Can you stay with me to-night . . . stay with me and love m . . . Oh!—there they come for me!"

Beret gave a long shriek that rent the night. Then sh sobbed violently, praying that they should not take her awa from Per Hansa. . . .

Per Hansa leaped to his feet, and found his voice.

"Satan—now you shall leave her alone!" he shouted, flin ing the door open and calling loudly to the women outsid Then he vanished into the darkness.

No one thought of seeking rest that night. All the ev ning, lights shone from the four huts; later they were e tinguished in two of them; but in the house of Hans Ol four men sat on, grieving over the way things were goi at Per Hansa's. When they could bear the suspense l longer some one proposed going over to get news.

Tönseten offered to go first. . . . When he came back l tle sense could be gathered from what he said. He had n allowed inside; the women were in a frenzy; the house completely upset; Beret was wailing so loud that it was dful to hear. And Per Hansa himself was nowhere to ound. . . . "We must go and look for him, boys! . . . en't you got a Bible or something to read from, Hans ? This is an awful thing!"

. . There they sat, each occupied with his own thoughts t all their thoughts were of the same trend. If Beret to-night, it would go hard with Per Hansa—indeed it d. In that case he probably wouldn't stay out here very . . . . But if he went away, the rest of them might as pack up and go, too!

m ran over to inquire; then Henry; at last it was s Olsa's turn. He managed to get a couple of words his wife, who said that Beret would hardly stand it. ne had seen Per Hansa.

an you imagine where the man can be keeping himself?" H Tönseten, giving voice to the fear that oppressed them . . "May the Lord preserve his wits, even if He ses to take his wife away!" . . .

r Hansa walked to and fro outside the hut all night ; when he heard some one coming he would run away the darkness. He could not speak to a living soul to-. As soon as the visitor had gone he would approach ut again, circle around it, stop, and listen. Tears were ming down his face, though he was not aware of it. Every shriek that pierced the walls of the hut drove off as if a whip had struck him; but as soon as it had out, something would draw him back again. At inter- he went to the door and held it ajar. . . . What did Hansa care for custom and decency, now that his Beret truggling with death! . . . Each time Sörine came to oor; each time she shook her head sadly, and told him was no change yet; it was doubtful if Beret would be to pull through; no person could endure this much r; God have mercy on all of them!

at was all the comfort Sörine could give him. . . . Then ould rush off into the darkness again, to continue his endless pacing; when daylight came they found a hard pa tramped into the snow around the hut.

The night was well-nigh spent when the wails in the began to weaken—then died out completely, and did not co again. Per Hansa crept up to the door, laid his ear cl to it, and listened. . . . So now the end had come! H breath seemed to leave him in a great sob. The wh prairie began to whirl around with him; he staggered f ward a few steps and threw himself face downward on t snow.

. . . But then suddenly things didn't seem so bad him . . . really not so bad. . . . He saw a rope . . rope. . . . It was a good, strong rope that would hold a thing. . . . It hung just inside the barn door—and the cro beam ran just there! . . . No trick at all to find these thin Per Hansa felt almost happy at the thought; that piece rope was good and strong—and the crossbeam ran j there!

. . . A door opened somewhere; a gleam of light flash across the snow, and vanished. Some one came out of hut quietly—then stopped, as if searching.

"Per Hansa!" a low voice called. . . . "Per Hansa, wh are you?" . . . He rose and staggered toward Kjersti l a drunken man.

"You must come in at once!" she whispered, and hurr in before him.

The light was dim in there; nevertheless it blinded him strongly that he could not see a thing. He stood a mom leaning against the door until his eyes had grown accuston to it. . . . A snug, cosy warmth enveloped him; it carr with it an odd, pleasant odour. The light, the warmth, a the pleasant smell overcame him like sweet sleep that ho a person who has been roused, but who does not care awaken just yet.

"How is it?" he heard a man's voice ask. Then he ca back to his senses. . . . Was that he himself speaking? .

"You'll have to ask Sörrina," Kjersti answered.

Sörine was tending something on the bed; not until n

. he discover her—and wake up completely. . . . What s this? . . . the expression on her face? Wasn't it beam- with motherly goodness and kindliness?

"Yes, here's your little fellow! I have done all I know w. Come and look at him. . . . It's the greatest miracle ver saw, Per Hansa, that you didn't lose your wife to- ht, and the child too! . . . I pray the Lord I never have suffer so!"

"Is there any hope?" was all Per Hansa could gasp—and n he clenched his teeth.

"It looks so, now—but you had better christen him at ce. . . . We had to handle him roughly, let me tell you."

"Christen him?" Per Hansa repeated, unable to com- hend the words.

"Why, yes, of course. I wouldn't wait, if he were mine."

Per Hansa heard no more—for now Beret turned her d and a wave of such warm joy welled up in him that the ice melted. He found himself crying softly, sobbing a child. . . . He approached the bed on tiptoe, bent r it, and gazed down into the weary, pale face. It lay re so white and still; her hair, braided in two thick plaits, ved over the pillow. All the dread, all the tormenting r that had so long disfigured her features, had vanished npletely. . . . She turned her head a little, barely opened eyes, and said, wearily:

"Oh, leave me in peace, Per Hansa. . . . Now I was eping so well."

. . The eyelids immediately closed.

XII

Per Hansa stood for a long time looking at his wife, dly daring to believe what he saw. She slept peacefully; small bundle lay beside her, from which peeped out a , red, wrinkled face. . . . As he continued to gaze at her sensed clearly that this moment was making him a better n!

At last he gathered his wits sufficiently to turn to Sörine and ask:

"Tell me, what sort of a fellow is this you have brought me—a boy or a girl?"

"Heavens! Per Hansa, how silly you talk!" . . . Kjersti and Sörine both had to laugh as they looked at Per Hansa; such a foolish, simple expression they had never seen on the face of a living man! . . . But Sörine immediately grew serious once more, and said that this was no time for joking; the way they had tugged and pulled at him during the night, you couldn't tell what might happen; Per Hansa must get the child christened right away; if he put it off, she refused to be responsible.

A puzzled expression came over the grinning face.

"You'd better do that christening yourself, Sörrina!"

—No!—she shook her head emphatically. That wasn't a woman's job—he must understand! . . . "And you ought to have it done with proper decorum, and thank the Lord for doing so well by you!"

Without another word Per Hansa found his cap and went to the door; but there he paused a moment to say:

"I know only one person around here who is worthy to perform such an act; since you are unwilling, I must go and get him. . . . In the meanwhile, you make ready what we will need; the hymn book you'll find on the shelf over by the window. . . . I won't be long!"

The kindly eyes of Sörine beamed with joy and pride; she knew very well the one he intended to get; this was really handsome of Per Hansa! . . . But then another thought crossed her mind; she followed him out, and closed the door after her.

"Wait a minute," she said. "I must tell you that your boy had the helmet[1] on when he came! . . . I think you ought to find a very beautiful name for him!"

[1] The English equivalent is, "to be born with the caul." Considerable superstition has always been attached to this phenomenon and in Norway especially so; a person born with the helmet on had been singled out by Destiny for something extraordinary.

"What are you saying, Sörrina!"

"Yes, sir—that he had! . . . And you know what that ieans!"

Per Hansa drew his sleeve across his face—then turned ıd walked away. A moisture dimmed his eyes—he could ot see. . . .

Outside it was now broad daylight; the sun stood some stance up in the sky, looking down on a desolate earth. was going to be cold to-day, Per Hansa noticed; clouds frosty mist like huge writhing serpents curled over the ırface of the purplish-yellow plain. The sunbeams plunging to them kindled a weird light. He tingled with the cold; s eyelashes froze together so that he had to rub them ith his mittens to keep them free.

. . . How remarkable—the child had been born with the elmet on! . . . He quickened his pace; in a moment he as running. . . .

"Peace be upon this house, and a merry Christmas, folks!" greeted them as he entered Hans Olsa's door. . . . The om was cold; the Solum boys lay in one bed, fully dressed; th were so sound asleep that they did not wake up at his ming. His own children and Sofie lay in the other bed, le by himself down at the foot, the other three on the pil-w; Store-Hans held And-Ongen close, as if trying to pro-ct her. Hans Olsa and Tönseten had moved their chairs to the stove, and sat hunched over on either side; Tönseten as nodding, the other was wide awake; both men jumped when Per Hansa came in, and stood staring at him.

Per Hansa had to laugh outright at them; they were look-g at him as if they had seen a ghost. But to the two men s laugh sounded pleasanter than anything they had heard in any a year.

"How are things coming?" asked Tönseten, excitedly, orking his shoulders.

"Oh, it might have been worse!"

Hans Olsa grasped his hand: "Will she pull through?"

"It looks that way."

Then Tönseten suddenly seemed to realize that it was cold in the room; he began to walk around, beating goose with his arms. . . . "I'm ready to bet both my horses that it's a boy! I can see it in your face!" he exclaimed, still beating

"All signs point that way, Syvert! But he's in pretty poor condition, Sörrina tells me. . . Now look here, Hans Olsa: it's up to you to come over and christen the boy for me!"

Hans Olsa looked terror-stricken at his neighbour. . . "You must be crazy, Per Hansa!"

"Nothing of the kind, Hans Olsa. . . . You just get yourself ready. . . . It's all written down in the hymn book—what to say, and how to go about it."

"No, no—I couldn't think of such a thing!" protested Hans Olsa, all of a tremble with the feeling of awe that had suddenly taken possession of him. . . . "A sinner like me!" . . .

Then Per Hansa made a remark that Tönseten thought was extremely well put:

"How you stand with the Lord I don't know. But this I do know: that a better man either on land or sea, He will have to look a long way to find. . . . And it seems to me that He has got to take that, too, into His reckoning!"

But Hans Olsa only stood there in terror. . . . "You'd better ask Syvert to do it!"

Then Tönseten grew alarmed:

"Don't stand there talking like a fool! . . . We all know that if one of us two is to tackle this job, it must be you Hans Olsa. . . . There is nothing for you to do but go at once; this business won't stand any dilly-dallying, let me tell you!"

Hans Olsa gazed straight ahead; his helplessness grew so great that he was funny to look at; but no one thought of laughing, just the same. . . . "If it only won't be blasphemy!" . . . He finally struggled into his big coat and put on his mittens. Then he turned to Tönseten. . . . "The book says: 'In an extreme emergency a layman may perform this act'—isn't that so?"

'Yes, yes—just so! . . . Whatever else you'll need, is itten there too!"

Through the frosty morning the two men walked silently ross the prairie, Per Hansa in the lead. When they had vered half the distance he stopped short and said to his ghbour:

'If it had been a girl, you see, she should have been med Beret—I decided that a long while ago. . . . But ing that it's a boy, we'll have to name him Per; you must Peder, of course! . . . I've thought a good deal about seph—he was a pretty fine lad, no doubt. . . . But grand- her's name was Per, and there wasn't a braver, worthier n on that part of the coast; so it'll just have to be Per ain this time. . . . But say, now—" Per Hansa paused a ment, pondering; then he looked up at his neighbour, and eyes began to gleam. . . . "The boy must have a second me—so you'd better christen him Peder Seier![1] . . . The t is after your Sörrina. . . . She has done me a greater vice this night than I can ever repay! And now the boy o be named after her!"

Hans Olsa could think of nothing to say in answer to all s. They walked on in silence. . . .

When they came into the room, they stepped across the eshold reverently. An air of Sabbath had descended on room. The sun shone brightly through the window, eading a golden lustre over the white walls; only along the th wall, where the bed stood, a half shadow lingered. . The fire crackled in the stove; the coffeepot was boiling. e table had been spread with a white cover; upon it lay open hymn book, with the page turned down. Beside hymn book stood a bowl of water; beside that lay a ce of white cloth. . . . Kjersti was tending the stove, ng the wood in diligently. . . . Sörine sat in the corner,

[1] The name Seier, which means Victorious, was altogether unusual Norwegian ears. The English equivalent will be used from now As this name plays such an important part in the psychology Book II the reader would do well to remember the Norwegian m.

crooning over a tiny bundle; out of the bundle at intervals came faint, wheezy chirrups, like the sounds that rise from a nest of young birds.

An irresistible force drew Per Hansa to the bed. . . . She lay sound asleep. . . . Thank God, that awful look of dread had not come back! He straightened himself up and glanced around the room; never before had he seen anything that looked so beautiful. . . .

Sörine got up, went to the table, and bared a little rosy human head.

"If you are going to be the minister here," she said, turning to her husband, who had remained standing motionless at the door, "then you must hurry up and get ready. . . . First of all you must wash your hands."

The next moment they had all gathered around the table.

"Here's the book. . . . Just read it out as well as you can, and we'll do whatever the book says," Sörine encouraged her husband. She seemed to have taken charge of the ceremony, and spoke in low, reassuring tones, as if she had done nothing else all her life but attend to such duties; and it was her confidence that gave Hans Olsa the courage he needed. . . . He went up to the table, took the book, and read the ritual in a trembling voice. slowly, with many pauses. And so he christened the child Peder Victorious, pronouncing the name clearly. Whereupon he said the Lord's Prayer so beautifully, that Kjersti exclaimed she had never heard the like.

"There, now!" said Kjersti with great emphasis. "I don't believe there is a thing lacking to make this christening perfectly correct! . . . Now the coffee is ready and we're all going to have a cup."

But Per Hansa was searching over in the corner; at last he produced a bottle. First he treated Sörine; then Kjersti. . . . "If ever two people have earned something good, you two are it! . . . Come on, now, have another little drop! . . . And hurry up about it, please! Hans Olsa and I feel pretty weak in the knees ourselves!"

. . . After a while both food and drink were served. . . .
t looks as if we were going to have a real Christmas, after !!" said Per Hansa with a laugh, as they sat around the ble enjoying their coffee.

END OF BOOK I

Book II
FOUNDING THE KINGDOM

On the Border of Utter Darkness

I

AN ENDLESS plain. From Kansas—Illinois, it stretched, far into the Canadian north, God alone knows how far; from the Mississippi River to the estern Rockies, miles without number. . . . Endless . . . ginningless.

A grey waste . . . an empty silence . . . a boundless ld. Snow fell; snow flew; a universe of nothing but dead niteness. Blizzards from out of the northwest raged, ooped down and stirred up a greyish-white fury, impene-able to human eyes. As soon as these monsters tired, rms from the northeast were sure to come, bringing more w. . . . "The Lord have mercy! This is awful!" said the k, for lack of anything else to say.

Monsterlike the Plain lay there—sucked in her breath one eek, and the next week blew it out again. Man she scorned; works she would not brook. . . . She would know, when e time came, how to guard herself and her own against n!

But there was something she did not know. Had it not en for the tiny newcomer, who by mysterious paths had und his way into the settlement on Christmas morning, monster might have had her way; but the newcomer made reach in her plans—a vital breach!

Most marvellous it was, a sort of witchery. A thing so ifully small and birdlike. . . . There was no substance to n, really nothing. Only a bit of tender flesh wrapped in nk silk. . . . But life dwelt in every fibre of it. Yet rdly life—rather the promise of it. Only a twitching and lling; something that stretched itself out and curled up again—so fine and delicate that one was afraid to touch it with rude hands.

Beret lay in bed with the newcomer beside her. . . . She should have been stiff and cold long ago; she should be lying in another place, a place where those fellows who howled at night could find fresh joints to lick and gnaw. . . . But here she was, still in bed. The button-sized, red-tipped nose dug itself into her breast, pushed in to find a good hold, and then lay still with satisfied little gruntings. The movement hurt her, but it gladdened her heart, too; for all the world she would not have had it otherwise. Life was returning; instead of that stiff, cold horror, Beret's body grew warmer and stronger with every day that passed. And the grunts at her side became more and more insistent. . . . Ah, well, she would have to shift him over, then, so that there might be peace for a moment!

. . . "Thank God, you have food enough for him!" said Per Hansa. . . . "I never saw a youngster with such an appetite!" . . .

When Beret had finally awakened on that Christmas day, she had acted exactly like the old woman in the fairy tale. She lay still, peeping out at her surroundings and asking herself: "Am I still here? Is this me?" . . . She could not believe it, and she would not believe it, either. . . . Hadn't she finished with this place some time ago?

But here she was, after all. Daylight shone broadly through the window and lit up the room; wood crackled in the stove; the very walls Per Hansa had whitewashed—so different they were from other walls—rose before her. She saw spots that she recognized; she had had endless trouble with the spots on these white walls, and the boys always so careless. . . . Clothes hung beside the stove, and above it stretched diapers on a line. The smell of wet clothes drying was familiar, but she could not understand where the diapers had come from. . . . Neither Per Hansa nor the children were in sight. . . . Where could they be? A quick thought crossed her mind: surely Per Hansa would not have let And-Ongen go out without bundling her up? . . . There was a man working about the stove, but Beret could not see her e. Perhaps it was Kjersti. Wasn't she wearing Kjersti's id Sunday skirt? . . . No, no, Beret could not understand at all. Had Kjersti gone with her, then, when she had parted—Kjersti, who was such a good woman? . . .

. . Beret quickly grew tired from puzzling over this solvable riddle. Through the haze of half-consciousness a rd and a number caught her eye . . . "Anno 16—" . . . had not used the big chest for her, then! Ah no! he probly had felt that he could not do without it. But it hurt deeply to know it; she had so much wanted to lie in the chest that she loved.

At last she sank into a doze, hovering gently on the borderbetween sleep and waking. . . . For an instant she pped off into unconsciousness; then she awoke with a rt and felt that things were growing clearer. Everything the house seemed to be in order. But she felt a vague, ubled curiosity to know where Per Hansa was, with Andgen and the boys. . . . Probably they had all gone over Hans Olsa's? . . . Slowly the fragments of thought were ling one another in her mind, meeting and coming toher, and taking on natural shape and form. A sense of li-being swept over her, so strong and healthy that it gradly calmed her senses and carried her off into a sound sleep. She was awakened awhile later by dreaming that she had en borne upward in the midst of something soft and rm . . . in an infinitely large room. . . . "This cannot go any longer," she thought. "If I rise any farther I cannot ssibly reach home by evening time. I must get back imdiately. Olamand's pants are almost worn out at the ees; I must mend them to-night or the boy will freeze to ath." . . . Making a sudden exertion, Beret was instantly le awake. . . .

And there stood And-Ongen leaning over the bed, strok her mother's cheek with a cool hand and stretching up on toe to get a better view of the little wrinkled red face in ret's arms. Store-Hans was hanging over the foot of the bed, looking at them, while his father was coming in wit an armful of wood.

"What have you done with Olamand?" she asked in natural voice, turning her head and looking about the roon

"He's off with Henry and Sam, hunting wolf tracks" Store-Hans hastened to answer, happy because his mothe was awake again. . . . "Won't you let us see Permand?"

"Please let us see Permand," begged And-Ongen; she le off stroking her mother's face and beamed down at her.

As soon as Per Hansa had brushed the bark and splinter from his clothes he came over to Beret, took her hand, an held it silently a long time. . . . It was difficult for him t speak, but he managed to wish her a happy Christmas and t thank her for her gift. . . . He would not let her hand g although her arm was growing tired.

No, he would not let it go.

. . . "Ah, Beret, Beret! . . . you know how to choos your time. Here you are with a great big boy at the ver peep of day on Christmas morning! . . . Who ever hear of such a woman?" . . . He spoke with a tense quietness his eyes were nothing but tiny slits in his face, from th great strain he was under. . . . She knew that his hear was crying.

The knowledge brought tears to her own eyes. She lay o her back, and the tears rolled down over both temples. Bu she did not notice them. A sweet, heavenly peace like sum mer enveloped her. . . . Warmth and stillness. . . . Sun light. . . . An Arctic night. . . . Carol of birds. . . . A great sea was throbbing and singing close at hand. . . . Ah it was good, after all, to be alive! . . .

Per Hansa suddenly found himself; his voice boomed ou in strong tones:

"Away from the bed, there, you brats. Can't you see hov tired mother is?"

Of that day Beret remembered little else except that sh

[1] Per, contracted from Peder;—mand, diminutive ending like th German kin; hence, Permand is equivalent to Pederkin. Olaman is formed in the same manner.

as weak and tired, that a mildness like summer seemed remain hovering about her, that songs rose over a quiet a, that a tender sun shone down, that everything was as it ould be, that all the world was good. . . . During the next w days she slept and slept, and never could sleep enough. e slept so much that there was no time left for thinking. fe in the bundle at her side grew stronger, demanded its es, and would not be denied. . . . It was such a joy to tend m. . . . Per Hansa was always kind now; his eyes were ere short lines in his face as he went about his work; the ildren were full of happiness; all the people in the world ere so kind to her that she could only lie there and be hamed of herself! . . .

II

Ah, that newcomer! . . . Had the Prairie been possessed the commonest hobgoblin sense, she would have guarded erself first of all against him. But this wisdom she had not. lorying in her great might, depending on the witchcraft that nd never failed her, she lay there unconcerned. And power-ul though she was, the newcomer minded her no more than e did him. Weak and insignificant, he yet bore within him e talisman to set her direst magic at naught. For he be-uiled the heavy-hearted folk into laughing, and what can vail against folk who laugh—who dare to laugh in the face f a winter like this one? . . . That winter it was he who aved people from insanity and the grave.

Beret began to worry and fuss, thinking they ought to ave all the neighbours over on the thirteenth day after hristmas. Hadn't the good neighbours cared for them roughout the holidays, and long before Christmas, too, as they had been their own kin? But, weak as she felt, she id not know how she could manage the preparations. She entioned this matter the first time she was up.

Per Hansa thought it a splendid idea. . . . Couldn't he nd the neighbour women manage the work? He went over talk to them about it. Kjersti burst out laughing and offered to come for two weeks if they wanted her. Sörir was delighted, too. Yes, indeed, they would come, if Ber would only promise to sit still and let them do all the worl

"Oh, there was a way of insuring that," said Per Hans with a roguish laugh. He had held Beret on his lap befo now, and he was man enough to do it again. . . . "Be su you come early, all of you!"

And so they came for dinner on the thirteenth day c Christmas, every one, and gathered in Per Hansa's cabi Tönseten had brought one of the bottles which Per Hans had carried home for him a generation or two ago. . . The bottle appeared suddenly on the table, and none of th others knew where it had come from. But they soon guesse the secret; for Tönseten blinked secretively, hinting that hi rheumatism was not so bad this winter. Marvellous climat here in the West! Had they noticed it? He felt so muc better that perhaps he would dare to take a little drink, too . . . Then there was food; there was coffee; there were th pipes; and much friendly chatting went on in Per Hansa' cabin that day. Time flew; the folks sat on into the night At dusk the men went out to do the chores, each to his ow place; they worked quickly that night. About the huts la a thick, woolly darkness, black and heavy, with snow driftin softly out of the heart of it. In their hurry to get back t Per Hansa's, the men hardly noticed the weather.

All felt closely drawn together that night. Their chattin became singularly intimate and hearty. When the men re turned, there was another bottle on the table, not more tha half full. None of them had brought it, and none coul guess where it had come from.

"Isn't it remarkable," marvelled Tönseten, "that suc things can spring up out of the very ground? This is truly the Promised Land! . . . Ah, that is Beret's work, now . . . I know the bottle!"

As they sat there chatting through the long evening, the talked of the newcomer—and again of the newcomer—th first newcomer who had found his way to the Spring Creek settlement. Everyone was aware of the many extraordinar rngs connected with his arrival. . . . Cunningly he had osen his time—the high and holy Christmas morn! . . .

sides, he had the caul on when he came. . . . And his ther had ventured to give him that bold second name . . .
ctorious—that was not at all a human name! . . .

Tönseten thought that Per Hansa had been reckless and d gone too far in giving the boy that second name. Per nsa must remember that he himself was only a human ng. . . . Where had he been on Christmas night, for in-nce? That was a thing Tönseten would like to know!
e wasn't outside, and he wasn't inside. . . . Tönseten had d a good many things like this to Kjersti when he had st heard about the name.

But that was one time when Tönseten should have kept ll! . . . Kjersti had been very angry with him and let him ow that it was both right and proper for an unusual child have an unusual name. So much Tönseten could stand; t what came next was harder to swallow. Kjersti had lked herself into a fit of crying—all about how lonely it s to sit there month after month without ever having ything to give a name to! He was wise enough about ner people's children, but she hadn't seen him do much ward getting one himself. What did he think he was made r, anyway? . . . Well, perhaps not, Syvert had said; and had added, viciously: Did she suppose that he could bear ildren? . . . Oh, he could talk like a fool . . . he could
. she had cried, stamping her foot on the floor. He could anything but what he ought to! He was good for nothing the world, the weak-kneed loafer!

But that episode was forgotten. Now they sat there recing over the newcomer. They all felt themselves to be areholders in him, but they couldn't agree over the division.
. The boy undoubtedly belonged to Beret and Per Hansa that was true enough and as it should be. But it didn't llow from this that they possessed the sole and only rights him. Had not Sörine and Kjersti stood by while the ship nk? Now, hadn't they? Hadn't they been the sponsors?
d not godmothers have a strong claim on their godchildren?

. . . And hadn't Hans Olsa been called out into the cold grey Christmas morning to take upon himself the holy duties of priesthood? It was he, indeed, who had poured the baptismal water and read the words that should sound over every Christian mortal! . . . All this was beyond dispute and no one grumbled over Hans Olsa's prior right to the child. . . . But, just the same, protested Tönseten, it was hardly fair play, either to him or to the Solum boys. No one of them had had a moment's peace on Christmas night; they had just been kept wading back and forth in the snow for the sake of that confounded baby. For his own part, he hadn't tasted a mouthful of food all day, and hadn't taken his trousers off all night! . . . Tönseten refused to be set aside in the midst of the company, with all his friends around him; he was less afraid of Kjersti. A sudden fancy struck him—he began teasing Sörine about the name. It was in his honour, of course, that the boy had been given that second name, and not in her honour at all! But Tönseten should have been more careful in raising this issue. Sam immediately struck in, insisting that Per Hansa must have taken the name from him—he had two names beginning with "S"!

. . . No, they could not agree over their claims. Nor did they fare any better when it came to determining the newcomer's destiny.

Henry, with an idea of eventually getting rid of his job, wanted the boy to be a schoolmaster. . . . But no, the good mothers wouldn't listen to the proposal. Schoolmaster! As if that were good enough for such a boy! Besides, they already had a schoolmaster. At this point Kjersti lifted up her voice and announced that he should be a minister. Then Sörine laughed and winked at her husband. Minister? . . . Oh, they already had a minister, too—one of a sort; the boy had been baptized quite in the proper Christian manner . . . As far as she could see, the newcomer would have to be a doctor. But this proposal started Per Hansa up with a new objection. Hadn't they doctors enough already, too? . . . There was Kjersti, and there was Sörine, and here he sat himself. Why, they had nothing but doctors! . . . Sam de them all laugh with his two suggestions: either a hymn iter or a general. . . . It must have been the latter alterna-e that gave Tönseten his big idea. He had been sitting re craftily pondering how he might outdo the whole of

m. Now he arose, knocked the ashes from his pipe, ared his throat mightily, and said, as if the thing were eordained and altogether beyond dispute:
"The boy will, of course, be President! He is born in country—everything points in that direction."
This ridiculous fancy threw them into gales of laughter.
t Hans Olsa did not join in the merriment; he remained ve and sat gazing thoughtfully at the wall. Now he etched, and said, as soon as he could be heard:
"I think we'll be more in need of a good governor out here, vert; these prairies will be a state some day."
And there the discussion ended. All felt that at last Hans sa had proposed something that bore the stamp of good se.
Neither Beret nor Per Hansa had taken part in this discus-
n. They sat listening to it, full of secret elation. . . .
ret's cheeks burned; Per Hansa was on the point, once or ce, of putting in his oar, but managed to stop himself in
e. . . . This was the proper occasion for him to hold his
gue. . . . What fun it was to hear them run on! . . .

III

No one knows what might have happened to them that nter if they had not had their school to fall back on. . . .
t there it was—a great school, too, a refuge for them all.
At first it was held in the house of the Solum boys, and e plan worked out very well. But then it occurred to rine that they ought to find a more practical arrangement.
enry might just as well conduct his school in her house; in ich case both she and Hans Olsa could benefit by the inuction. And Sam could come over, too. Both the Solum ys were pleased with the new plan.
A little later, when Beret was quite well again, Per Hansa came one day to inquire if it mightn't be possible to mo the school to his house every other week—for Beret's sak It would be interesting for her to listen to the instructio and, besides, both of them needed to learn English. Wh couldn't Henry teach his school just as well over there? . . They all agreed that this was the thing to do.

But Tönseten, as usual, wasn't quite satisfied with th arrangement; he felt that they weren't being entirely fair t him. So he proposed that they should move the school to h house every third week. There was plenty of food for bot Henry and Sam. True enough, he had no children; bu they should remember that he had fathered the school itsel Think how lonely it was for him and Kjersti to be mopin in the hut all by themselves while the others every oth week were enjoying company and the glory of learning! . . Why not be brotherly and share the best with the worst? . .

Again the new plan was agreed upon, and that became th final arrangement for holding the school.

There was little to do, either outdoors or indoors, durin these days. Often the menfolk would sit in the school bot morning and afternoon, and the women made a practice o attending every afternoon. They came with their handiwork and the men with their pipes. At last the school became in dispensable to all of them. The men could not bear to lose minute of it; and as for the women, as soon as they ha cleared away the dinner things they would bundle old skirt over their heads and set out in the snowstorm for the hous where the school was being conducted.

Never, perhaps, was a school organized along strange lines, or based on looser pedagogical principles; but—ah well! It was in reality a flexible institution, with all sort of functions. It served as primary school and gramma school, as language school—in both Norwegian and Englis —and religious school; in one sense it was a club; in anothe it was a debating society, where everything between heave and earth became fit matter for argument; on other occasion it turned into a singing school, a coffee party, or a socia centre; and sometimes, in serious moods, it took on the aspec a devotional meeting, a solemn confessional. In these ys the school bound subtly and inseparably together the v souls who lived out there in the wilderness. . . . It en happened that both recitation and instruction were oken up for the children because the grown folk inter-oted, became absorbed in the discussion, and usurped the ole time.

n the beginning Henry was at his wits' end to know how fill in the day. There were no books, and no school mate-ls of any kind. In this pass, he resorted to the means that nearest at hand—story-telling. Hunting through his mory, he sought out all the tales that he had heard or d; and these he related in either Norwegian or English, lking the children repeat them until they had been mem-zed. In this way they learned both the story and the guage—such as it was. Then he proposed to set them the k of writing words and sentences. A fine plan, if they y had something to write on and something to write with.
. Hans Olsa made a large wooden slate for his girl, and e her the last remaining stub of a carpenter's pencil which had brought from Norway. . . . And now that Sofie had late, Per Hansa's boys must have something to write on,
... Their father took the two thickest pieces of log that he standing behind the stove, and whittled each into an obt intended to be a writing board; but Ole called his an ox e, because it was so heavy to carry around. For pencils y used nails and bits of charcoal. . . . But one day when re-Hans went on an errand to Kjersti's house, she had a sent for him—a great bunch of folded paper bags and apping paper. . . . And in the chest she had found a small e of pencil that Syvert had hidden there. . . . She sup-ed she would have no use for it herself, she said with a
, and she knew of no one she would rather give it to n Store-Hans, for he was a fine boy. She wept a little she gave him these simple things. Store-Hans was dented with the gift, and on this account he was for a while aristocrat of the school.

Before the school became itinerant it had been discovered that Sam could sing. The discovery had come about in th following manner: One day Henry had completely ex hausted his knowledge and ingenuity and didn't know wh to do next; suddenly he turned to his brother, who sat o the chest listening to the instruction, and ripped out:

"Let's go east, man, and get out of here! . . . This is th devil's own foolishness!"

"Why don't you try singing with them?" Sam answere bouncing up from the chest with the excitement of his ide

"I'll leave that job for you," snapped Henry, snatching h cap and running out of the room.

And there stood Sam, looking blankly at the childre whose eyes were fixed on him with an equally blank star He couldn't bear to be the object of their ridicule; ther was no one else in the room; no other idea came to h rescue; and so he began to sing. He had a good voice, an found himself falling naturally into the methods by whic he had been taught. It all came back to him, and becaus his singing was really good, the scholars caught fire at and the new idea worked well.

Perhaps this incident saved the school at a critical time But it did vastly more. That winter they learned to sin many songs. The children learned them, and the grow people learned them, too. There were hymns and nationa anthems; there were folk songs and war songs; and ther were many, many love songs from their own Nordland, wit not a few Swedish love ballads as well. . . . By the time th school had become itinerant, Sam had acquired two goo assistants; for now it appeared that both Sörine and Kjers possessed in memory a goodly store of ditties. . . . Every thing of that nature was routed out from its hiding plac and put into active use.

Tönseten became at times a troublesome listener at thes functions. If, as he sat there following Henry's instructio he thought that he detected heresy, or if he disliked th method of teaching, he said so without mincing words. A to pedagogical methods, Tönseten was very particular. I his opinion, Henry lacked the proper and necessary cunnin formulating his questions; he put the matter too simply. nat was the use of asking questions that anybody could derstand?

Problems in arithmetic always had to be worked out men-y, on account of the lack of writing materials. One day they were doing sums, Tönseten arose and informed m that now he proposed to try their skill for a minute two! . . . "Just take a rest for a little while, Henry!" said. The whole neighbourhood was gathered that day Tönseten's sod house.

He struck a dignified pose in front of the table.

Listen carefully now, you numskulls; here is something ry your heads on. Now then: five crows were sitting in ree . . . five, you understand! . . . A man came by with un. He shot one of them. How many were left in the e?"

Tönseten gave them a severe look as he finished his ques-n.

Huh!" grunted Ole, who was the brightest student at ns, "you are only fooling!"

That is no problem," said Sofie. "There were four crows , of course."

Yes, if they were such dumb crows as you and Ola! . . . w, Hans, how many were left?"

None," answered Hans, thoughtfully.

Right-o! There were none left. . . . But say, Hans, at do you think became of the others?"

Aw . . ." drawled the boy in his deep voice, "I suppose y flew away."

Sure they did! . . . Why should they keep on sitting re?" . . .

Tönseten was in a sparkling humour.

Now we will just try another one. Listen hard now, ie; this one is for you. The minister had three daughters, l the deacon also had three; but when the deacon's ghters were with the minister's daughters, there were no re than three. How can that be explained?"

The problem was simply senseless, laughed Sofie; when there were six, there simply must be six, and no way ou of it! . . .

"Don't listen to him," said Ole. "He's only fooling!"

"Fooling!" thundered Tönseten. "It seems to me tha you are doing the fooling. . . . Well, Hansy, you will hav to go at it again!"

None of the grown people had heard this riddle befor They laughed heartily and thought it great fun. Kjersti knitting sank into her lap. . . . No doubt about it, Syver was clever at asking questions!

"Hans," said Tönseten, sternly, "put your brains to work!

"I—I suppose there was only one man with daughters?" submitted Store-Hans, carefully.

"Did you ever see the like of the cleverness in that boy . . . Yes; you see, the fact of it was that the minister wa a deacon in his own church. Very likely there wasn't any one else who could serve as deacon!"

Tönseten gave Store-Hans a fatherly pat on the head. . . "There's much good stuff inside that skull of yours. I thin you'll be a minister, after all."

And then Tönseten straightened up and turned to fac Henry. . . . "That's the way to ask questions, Henry! . . . His face was red from his efforts; he looked ridicu lously fierce as he sat down.

IV

Drifting snow and cold . . . a yellow sky . . . gre weather . . . blizzards that lasted for days. . . . If i cleared off for an afternoon, the sun dogs were on constan guard. Everyone knew what that meant! . . .

The winter's supply of wood which the settlers ha brought home was disappearing very fast—it had vanishe like snow in a warm spring thaw. Now it was almost gone

Hans Olsa had discovered a new kind of fuel that grew more and more valuable to them as their wood supply ra low. One day as he was clearing the manger of coarse ha which the cow refused to eat it had struck him that thi -off hay might possibly be put to a practical use. Hans a was a frugal man, who tried to utilize everything that ie to his hand. Why wouldn't this hay make good king? . . . In order to avoid littering up the floor of the se, he twisted the hay into fagots before he carried it It made fairly good fuel, burning fast, of course, but ing up like birch bark and giving off a fine heat. . . .

once he told his neighbours of the discovery, and they an to burn their hay, too. . . . But it had to be done ringly; they mustn't run the chance of a cattle famine, ase the spring should turn out to be a long, hard one.
these coarse hay fagots solved their fuel situation for a le.

long in February, however, there was no way out of it—fact confronted them that the men would have to go east the Sioux River for a further supply of wood. The rney demanded great preparations and left little time for ng to school. But it was decided that in spite of everyg, Henry must keep on with his teaching. Since they dn't leave the women alone under any circumstances, the ol served as a good excuse for keeping him at home.
would have to be the guardian of the whole settlement
le they were gone.

Both Tönseten and Hans Olsa thought it impossible for Hansa to make such a journey with oxen at this time the year; they advised him to join forces with them.
n they could all work together, and divide equally what-r they brought home. This sounded like good counsel, Per Hansa made no objection to it at the time. But for ay or two he went about his work pondering deeply.
ore Christmas he had made a sleigh, such as it was. One ht he asked the boys to help him after school, and, taking oxen out, he began to train them for halter-driving.
retofore he had used only the yoke, shouting "gee" and w," like everyone else in those days, who drove oxen.
He had bought his ox team in eastern Minnesota the vious winter, from a Swede who was glad to get rid of m because he wanted to buy horses instead. The Swede had bought the oxen from an Irishman in southern Iow and no one knew how many other owners the team had ha The Swede had called them "Tom" and "Buck," but P Hansa had disliked the names. Bound on a great voya of adventure as he was, his boats had to be proper christened. So he had gone about thinking for a while, ar at length had named the oxen "Sören" and "Perkel." T Sören he had added the prefix "Old," so that the full nan of the animal was Old Sören.[1] And sometimes, when h was in his very brightest mood, he'd prefix the same a jective before the other name, too, because that sounde more affectionate. This renaming was an easy process f the oxen, perhaps because the new owner had a temperame so entirely unfamiliar to the beasts; the hide on their loi showed with startling clearness that petting had been a unknown factor in their earlier history.

The boys and the oxen had immediately become fir friends, Store-Hans adopting one of them as his speci charge, Ole the other. They scratched the oxen's heads, the rode them like horses, and soon the animals would com trotting after whenever they caught sight of the boys; an as they stood patiently with the children hanging aroun their necks, giving them a good scratching, and saying "Ol Sören" to one and "Perkel" to the other, they must som how have learned to associate this treatment with their ne names, and the words must have sunk in. At any rate, th oxen always responded now when their names were calle

When Per Hansa that cold winter day took them out o the stable to teach them the new kind of driving, they we a pair of ragged and ugly-looking beasts. They stood in th snow before the sleigh and gazed dully over the whi prairie, where the snow lay drifting. They didn't kno what to make of their new harnesses. All went well for while, but presently they lurched right into a snowdrift, an stood there motionless, sticking out their tongues and lickin the snow. . . . This would never do! . . . Ole shot fo

[1] Both names are colloquial expressions, peculiar to the dialect o Nordland; they mean the same thing, viz., Old Nick.

d and began scratching furiously; Store-Hans did the e on the other side; and when the oxen had thought it long enough, and the commands from Per Hansa had n on a brittle tone, they threw themselves forward into harness and yanked the sleigh out like a feather, regard-of how deeply it had been lodged in the drift. They on training the oxen every day, and got a good deal un out of it into the bargain. . . . At last it had prosed so far that one evening, as they unhitched the team, Hansa said to the boys:

There, they are working out splendidly. . . . Now, if two were worth your salt, you would take this outfit and e to the Pacific coast for a load of fish for your mother me!" The boys grinned and said nothing.

ut Per Hansa had determined to make the trip to the nx River with the oxen. That evening he was very highited and happy. . . . As they were going to bed and et was sitting by the stove tending the baby for the night, said, "I suppose you must make this trip, then?"

Well, yes, I should say I must, if you and the newcomer n't to freeze stiff!" . . .

othing more passed between them on the subject. Again et lay awake far into the night, turning her thoughts over er mind.

his thing was terrible! . . .

V

he men delayed their trip for several days, waiting for right sort of weather. The wind veered around un-ainly; the sleighing looked treacherous; the cold was ply fearful—it bit into whatever it could lay its hands on would not let go.

t last came a morning which gave promise of a clear day.
the sun rose higher and higher a soft breeze began to w, like the first breath of spring. It seemed to be the y weather they had been waiting for. . . . The men nered together in a little knot to talk it over, wondering if it would be safe to chance it to-day. . . . Well, yes, looked all right now, speculated Tönseten, peering into t sky and turning his quid in his cheek; but this sort weather wasn't exactly dependable. Somehow, it didn't se natural for this time of year. . . . "It has too sweet a fa I think!"

They had better make a start, counselled Hans Ol Already it was late in February; the spring thaw would so be setting in.

"Well," said Per Hansa, "if we have any idea of bringi a few sticks of wood home before the haying season begi we'd better get a move on. . . . All the same, I agree wi you, Syvert. . . . It looks to me like a weather-breed But we ought to be able to reach the Trönders' before an thing happens."

Then they began to get ready. There were numberle things to attend to, so that it was past ten o'clock befo they set out. They had not burdened themselves with pr visions, knowing that they would soon come to hospitab folk; but to be on the safe side they all carried a sm supply of food in their pockets.

The four teams formed quite a caravan, each with i own sleigh, trailing in single file across the white pla Hans Olsa, who had the fastest horses, drove in the va then came Tönseten; then Sam; while Per Hansa's oxe shambling along with him and his sleigh, drew up the re

The whole settlement was out-of-doors to see the carav set forth. The children were dismissed from school for little while; the grown folks left their work. . . . Sto Hans clenched his fists in impotent fury. . . . What foolis ness! . . . What an idiotic arrangement! Here they h to sit indoors, he and his brother, in such fine weath chewing over and over again the stories they knew by hea while off went the men, bound for all sorts of wonderf adventures! . . . Father would be taking Old Maria alo . . . He might shoot a dozen wolves to-day! . . . Perha there would be smooth ice on the river, and a hole in the i and fish, and everything! And strangers to be met, a rn-up talk going. . . . Oh, what nonsense, to have to here! . . . His brother was in the same state of bitter t; that day the boys learned very little in school.

ret had laid the baby down and gone out with the s; but just as the men were about to start she ran back the house, her knees trembling under her. . . . The ow faced the east and they were going eastward, but could not bring herself to look out. . . . But what she was not exactly fear—was not the same fear that had ed her the time before when he had left her alone. . . . was a sense of powerlessness. . . .

ne caravan crept away. Sleighs and animals grew ler and smaller; at last they were nothing but tiny dots on the endless white expanse of the plain. . . .

l went well with Per Hansa and the oxen. Once the y animals had started, they kept the track without any ulty, and didn't lag very far behind, either. The snow soft, and it soon proved heavy, slow work to break rack. The three teams of horses had to take turns at it. ugh the weather still looked steady, the men pushed on ast as they could.

me time after midday the breeze settled down into a south wind; the snow was growing more and more y under the runners; the air seemed as soft as a May in the whole arch of the sky not a cloud nor the trace cloud could be seen; the sunshine almost blinded them its radiant brilliancy.

is lasted without change until after three o'clock.

far everything had gone without a hitch and Per Hansa ed that in two or three hours they would sight the hills by the Sioux River. But just then, chancing to glance toward the western horizon, he caught sight of a black, wy outline above the prairie, looming ominously against sky. . . . Were his eyes deceiving him? He rubbed and looked again; rubbed them harder and gazed in- y at the sight. . . . Sure enough it was a veritable out- the form of a low-lying dark cloud. . . . His heart pounded against his breast; he spoke quickly and rougl to the oxen. . . .

The apparition was moving out there—came rushing f ward and upward with uncanny speed. The outline h now become a dark, opaque mass . . . it writhed and swell with life . . . it seemed to be belching up over all the sl like sooty smoke out of a furnace. Above his head t heavens were still clear; but under the rim of the onrushi cloud a bluish-black shadow had settled on the prairie.

The south wind suddenly died in fitful gasps, leaving chill in the air. . . . A weird silence had fallen. . . . T thing in the west was possessed of baleful life. It shot o ward and upward. . . . Sighs as if out of a cold cavern r before it. . . . In a twinkling, the day had been swallow in gloom. . . .

Those in the lead had stopped at the first warning. Ha Olsa had waited until Tönseten and Sam came up; when H Hansa reached them, the three sleighs were all huddled gether.

"It's going to strike us in a minute," said Hans Ol soberly. He was standing beside his sleigh, clearing t lashing-rope.

"Looks like it," answered Per Hansa, dryly. "If we e get out of this—!" . . . He jumped out and followed Ha Olsa's lead, clearing his own rope.

The Solum boy said nothing, but worked frantically get his rope untangled.

"This is what we must do," said Hans Olsa: "We'll pa a rope from sleigh to sleigh, so that we won't lose each oth in the storm. Isn't that right, Per Hansa?"

"Yes, yes!" His sailor instincts were all alive. "It loo as if the storm would travel the way we're going. We'll ha to watch the wind. . . . Whatever you do, keep a sharp loo out for the country we know on this side of the river. we should sail past the Trönders', there'll be hell to pay. . Hurry up, now. Damn the luck, that we haven't got compass!" The words tumbled out of Per Hansa's mou in a raging flood.

ach man tied his lashing-rope to the sleigh, and gave other end to the next one behind. Per Hansa ran for- l to the Solum boy:

All ready, Sam? Are you sure your rope is fast? I t believe I'll be able to keep up with you. . . . But listen: t give a thought to what lies behind you! Do you hear? l on like hell to Syvert's rope! It's a matter of life death. Do you understand? . . . Now we must get a e on!"

oth Per Hansa and Hans Olsa—old Lofot-men that they e—had seen plenty of storms that made up fast; but ing like this had ever before come within the range of experience. Like lightning a giant troll had risen up in west, ripped open his great sack of woolly fleece, and ied the whole contents of it above their heads.

squall of snow so thick that they could not see an s length ahead of them, a sucking noise, a few angry s, howling in fury, then dropping away to uncertain ghts of air that wandered idly here and there, swirling light snowfall around the sleighs. High overhead, a p hissing sound mingled with growls like thunder—and the blizzard broke in all its terror. . . .

VI

ne storm howled and whined, driving the snow before ce giant breakers. A grey-black spume enveloped them, ging cloud. . . . Instinctively, Per Hansa found himself ing through the murk, knitting his brows and squinting is right eye—an old habit of his, born of the many s he had looked to see if the mast would hold!

violent jerk came on his rope, so strong that he almost ged forward. To save himself from being dragged off leigh he was forced to let go his hold. . . . "There goes !" he muttered, grinding his teeth together.

ne boat that he steered was behaving very badly; it dn't answer the helm; it didn't ride the swell like a sea- hy craft; it had no speed or power to lift itself over the rough waves. The oxen shambled and floundered alon veering before the wind; with every clumsy step they we more slowly; at last, with a great heave, they stood stoc still. Drawing their heads as far as they could into the short necks, they twitched their bodies a little, hunched the backs, and lowered their heavy rumps into the snow, meet the force of the gale. . . .

There they stood!

"God Almighty!" . . . muttered Per Hansa into t storm. Quick as lightning the thought flashed through h mind: Run your knife into one of them, rip off his hid wrap yourself in it, and let yourself snow under—it's yo only salvation!

No, no, Per Hansa couldn't do that. Old Sören ar Perkel had brought him and his family all the way acro the plains; they had broken every inch of his fields; if h were ever to have a lordly estate, it would come abo through the labor of these beasts. . . . And Old Sören ha such kind eyes, and Perkel always came so quickly when the called him.

Per Hansa threw himself out of the sleigh and fumble his way along the traces till he came to the oxen; he caug hold of their necks and began rubbing their forehead While he rubbed, he talked into their ears:

"Now, Old Sören . . . now, damn you, Perkel. By Go you'll have to be good boys!" . . .

With rough caresses he swept the snow off their back scratched their rumps a moment, then crept back into t sleigh. Summoning all his force, he shouted in a migh voice, "Get along now, you devils!" The whip lashed an cracked—the first time since he had bought them that h had ever struck them in real earnest. . . . The oxen gave tremendous plunge . . . another . . . and off they careere into the heart of the storm. Per Hansa felt as if he we sliding down one huge wave after another; the boat wa scudding now with terrific speed! . . . Still on they wen tossing and plunging, down and down! . . .

"Will we ever climb the next wave?" thought Per Hans

. . Why, what in Heaven's name was this? Something happened very suddenly. He thought that he heard a crash, as if two logs had smashed violently together;
ugh the murk he glimpsed a black object flying across oows and disappearing astern. . . . Wasn't that another?
another? . . . Why! . . . He must be passing the r teams!

Whoa! Whoa, there!" he bellowed down the wind.
p! . . . t-r-r-r-o!" . . . He was so angry that he nearly e the lines. . . . "Who ever saw such devils! Stop!
oa!" . . .

ut the oxen paid not the slightest attention to him. The tt of the storm had possessed them; they tore along like things; whenever they struck a snowdrift, they plunged ugh it so furiously that the snow thrown up by their
and the sleigh was thicker than that which fell from
e. Per Hansa could do nothing but cling desperately e sleigh. . . . This mad race through the inferno of the n lasted a long time; how long he did not know, but it ed to him as if it had gone on forever. . . .

ut finally the oxen slackened their speed; the wild gallop to a trot; the trot fell to a tired jog . . . and then they ed altogether. He could distinctly hear their exhausted ng through the roar of the storm.

er Hansa scrambled down from the sleigh again and aged to open one of the hay sacks. He tore out a hand-f hay, plowed his way forward, and began to rub down oxen with the dry wisp. . . . The storm was now so fic that it was impossible to turn one's face against it.
stinging snow drove like icy needles and broke the skin.
rubbed and rubbed, first Old Sören, then Perkel; and n his strength was gone and he could rub no longer, he ggled back to fetch the hay sack, held it under their s, and let them eat. . . . He stood there holding it so that he grew stiff with the cold and with the piercing that stuck in his clothes like nails. . . . "Hurry now, y now, troll-boys! God be praised, you can still wag jaws!" he spoke in their ears.

At last he got back to the sleigh, loosened the blank and wrapped it close around him. He emptied the h sack and bundled it over his head. . . . Then he shouted few vigorous words of encouragement to the oxen: n they must get along—now, by God, they must show wh stuff they were made of! . . .

But the beasts had a different notion, an idea all their ow instead of rushing off as before, they began to saunt slowly with the wind, moving forward at exactly the sa speed as when they were drawing the plow on a hot summ day. Per Hansa tried every means he could think of start them up; he fumed and swore; he coaxed them a used all kinds of pet names; he grabbed the whip and lash them mercilessly, but everything had the same effect, or effect at all. The oxen sauntered along, dragging him a his sleigh as unconcernedly through the storm as if th were on their way down to the creek to drink.

It had now grown pitch dark; the night pressed close abo him. Snow was not falling as thickly as in the afternoo but the cold had become intense . . . it cut into his back li a heavy, dull knife; the wind had risen into a solid bla so that he had hard work to keep his seat in the sleigh. . He sat there, huddled and freezing, and stared out into t blackness. So, this was his last journey! . . .

The thought only made him impatient. . . . God Almigh might have waited awhile longer, until they had seen ho their luck would go out here and what sort of a boy Perma would turn out to be. . . . It was a queer thing that H should want to be so cruel to Beret—a sick woman left alo in this terrible place, so far out in the wilderness—and wit out the oxen, too! . . . A strange fate, this, I'll be damn if it isn't! thought Per Hansa.

. . . By and by he began to feel that he was really free ing. He tied the lines about his thighs and took to beati his arms. It helped his hands, but his back only grew colde the wind cut through and through. . . .

. . . It seemed to him that by this time he must have go by the Trönders'—a long way by. The oxen wouldn't st

. they had reached the Atlantic Ocean! . . . He was so now that his teeth chattered all the time and couldn't

. . Then, after a while, the cold seemed to be letting up; cerrible sucking emptiness inside him had gone away; he tired and drowsy . . . a good feeling. . . .

e pulled himself furiously together and deliberately ved his tongue to keep awake. He knew too well what drowsy feeling meant! . . .

. . It must not happen—it should not happen! To think Beret alone there with four youngsters! . . . Making a erate effort, he flung himself out of the sleigh and stag- d along beside the oxen, the lines wound securely around arm.

. . Struggling through the storm, he felt more and more usted with God Almighty. To take him away from et now would be a wicked thing, whichever way you ed at it. . . . What could He expect to accomplish by a wrong? . . . There wasn't a better, truer soul alive Beret. . . . Was this the way God cared for His own? Beret, Beret," he kept sobbing to himself. "I'm go- . . ."

he storm raged around him; the cold bit deeper and nger. He staggered on in the midst of a vast darkness, t by furious monsters, fighting a battle that seemed to without respite and without end. . . . On and on he nbled, on and on. . . .

trangely enough, he didn't seem tired at all—the fight n't exhaust him. . . . What sort of a place would he get f he kept on travelling like this a week or two? . . . A e occurred to him as if it had risen out of the storm—he ned to see it shining before his eyes: Rocky Mountains The Rocky Mountains? What a strange fancy! . . . ndering through the snowdrifts, this name seemed to be ken in pieces as it ran through his mind: Rocky-ocky- un-tains! . . . Rocky-ocky, rocky-ocky . . . Moun-tains, un-tains! . . . Then he fell down; pulling himself rily out of the snowdrift, another thought crossed his mind. . . . It was all a mistake—the Rocky Mountai didn't lie in this direction. . . . God! was he going sta mad? . . . He probably wouldn't be able to last much longe

. . . How sweet it would be—what a blessed, infinite reli
—to sit down here in this snowdrift and rest a little whil
Only a moment . . . it wouldn't take long . . . sleep wou
so soon overcome him.

Suddenly he was aroused by a new thought, that sho him wide awake and stirred his numbed senses: Sam
What had happened to Sam? They couldn't leave him the lurch. . . . Sam was a promising boy. He'd probab make a splendid citizen some day, with his fine voice a all his other good qualities. . . . God above, was he, P Hansa, going to be blamed for this, too, that Sam would lo his life to-night? . . . If he had kept his mouth shut th evening and let them go on their way, both Sam and Hen might now have been safe and sound in eastern Minneso with their own folks! . . . But perhaps those who ha horses would be able to pull through, since the storm wasn growing any worse. If only they didn't desert the boy!

Per Hansa was stumbling and falling a good deal nov each time he fell it was harder to get up. The lines we jammed tightly around his arm; the oxen plowed onwar without a pause; he had to get up or be dragged through th snow. Neither could he loosen the lines, for his mitte were frozen stiff. . . . Rocky-ocky Moun-tains, Rocky-ock Moun-tains! . . . Directly behind those mountains lay th Pacific Ocean. . . . They had no winter on that coast . .
no winter, and they fished both halibut and salmon! Goo no winter! . . . If he could only gain his way across . .
across the . . . Rocky-ocky Moun-tains! . . .

. . . The devil take it! . . . but this was all wrong!

Steadily onward the oxen plowed, dragging Per Hans by the arm. Stumble and fall as he would, he had to g up again and struggle along. . . .

. . . What had happened now? The oxen had stopped—were standing still. Per Hansa wasn't being dragged fo ward any longer.

His first impulse was to sink down where he stood, to ch a moment's peace, to give up to the weariness that overmastering him. But deep down within him a voice manded him to keep on standing. . . . He followed the s, fumbled his way forward to Perkel, flung his arm ss the animal's back, and leaned against his thigh. . . .
What nonsense was this? . . . Day breaking again? . . .
ween the heads of the two oxen a yellow eye seemed to leaming through the curtain of the driving snow . . . a t yellow eye. . . .

t must be my death signal!" thought Per Hansa. "Then already across the boundary line!" . . .

uddenly Old Sören gave a long-drawn bellow. The nd had scarcely died away when Perkel lifted his voice to second his comrade's motion. He put such a power-effort into that bellow that his muscles strained and his le body contracted. The noise shook Per Hansa out of grim revery. He felt his way along Perkel's back until nad reached the animal's head . . . it was rammed full-against a log wall! . . .

ere was the corner . . . the corner of a house. . . .
er Hansa trembled so violently that he could hardly keep feet. He saw now that the eye shining through the ting snow was in reality the light from a small window his log wall. . . . Good Heavens! Had he plowed and nged clear through to Fillmore County? . . . He found way around the house corner, came to a door, flung it n without ceremony, and stumbled in.

VII

er Hansa saw nothing as he stumbled into the cabin.
heat of the room seemed to flow over him in a great e, deadening all his senses. The light blinded him; he d not open his eyes beyond a narrow slit; his face was sted with snow and ice; his eyelashes were frozen toner. . . . But he was conscious, with a deep sense of joy relief, that this was a safe place and that there were folk around him again—Norwegian folk, his own people. . . When he had first felt the build of the cornice, out there the snowstorm, he had sensed instinctively that here liv Norwegians. . . . Out of the jaws of death he had walk in a single step into warmth and life and safety. . . . But was easier to warm his body than to thaw out his so The reaction was too swift and too tremendous; he f himself growing faint and dizzy and was barely able stand.

"Give me something to sit down on, good folk," he hea a faint voice saying far away. For a moment, he thoug that his senses were going to leave him. . . . He must hur and say what he had to say! . . . "You'll find . . . tw oxen . . . two good oxen outside. . . . Get them und cover at once! . . . I'm all right—but the oxen—!"

Some one shoved forward a chair. He felt vaguely that must be meant for him, took hold of the back, and let hi self sink down. . . . His frozen clothes crackled like shee of ice, shedding a little flurry of snow.

. . . "There, I'm tracking up your floor! . . . but lo after the oxen—the oxen——"

A hubbub of confused, excited voices rose around hi He felt that there must be a crowd of people in the roo but their faces were all a blank to him. A thick haze seem to surround them, swimming before his eyes.

Then a person got up right by his side—a palpable figu confronted him. Per Hansa gave a start—the voice sounde strangely familiar.

"For the Lord's sake! Is this you, Per Hansa?" it sai

All at once Per Hansa burst into a laugh.

"Where the devil did you drop from, Syvert? . . . Is Sa with you?"

"Can't you see the boy? . . . He's sitting in the cha right in front of you. . . . Thank God, Per Hansa, you' still alive!"

No wonder that they had failed to recognize him, wonder that he couldn't see, or that his voice sounded we and strange, for his whole face was covered with a mask

-caked snow which had not melted yet in the heat of the n. It was firmly fastened to his eyebrows and beard; it ed his cap to his coat collar and hung down behind over ack in a white sheet. If ever there was a snow king in an form, it was Per Hansa that night as he sat thawing n Simon Baarstad's cabin.

ttle by little his five senses came back to him; and sure gh, there they all were, his good neighbours. He knew room well, too, and the folk who owned it. . . . He ll see Sam plainly enough now—Sam, who could sing so
. sitting close to the stove, beside a fair young girl. . . .
couldn't make out whether he was closer to the girl or ne stove. Per Hansa smiled to himself. . . . Ah, Sam,
! . . . No doubt about your being a good man some
. . .

e listened in deep contentment while Hans Olsa related they had driven like demons, to save their lives. They had no idea where they were going nor what lay ahead nem; but at the last moment, when they had almost given nope, they had gotten their bearings of the country on side of the river and had arrived at this very spot. That been two hours ago; it was now past nine o'clock. . . .
er Hansa heard them as if in a dream. The terrible trip
't concern him any longer. It was all over now. . . .
ething else that was going on in the room interested
a great deal more: beside the stove stood Gurina Baar, handling a stewpan. She had filled it over half full of
; when the milk began to simmer she added a goodly ion of strong, home-brewed beer.

My dear, blessed Gurina, don't be stingy, now!" Per sa teased her. The hot mixture was strong, brown, and
hy. They gave him a large bowlful; he drank and
k. . . .

God, if a fellow had thirteen barrels of this stuff of s, Gurina! . . . You don't happen to have another little in the pan?" . . . She gave him a second bowlful, ch he emptied as greedily as the first. . . . All at once, ething occurred to him. He turned to ask a question.

. . . Had any of them seen him drive past them in t storm?

Drive past them! . . . "You're talking wild, Per Hansa said Tönseten, with an anxious look. Per Hansa was d his base to-night!

—Certainly not—nothing wild about that! They had be ter take a look at Sam's sleigh to-morrow, if they didn't b lieve him. He had almost run Sam down as he shot b . . . "Say, didn't you see me, Sam?"

Well, Sam remembered that he did see something go by- something black, that flew past like a wraith of the storr It had been just after the squall broke. He had felt terrific jolt go over the sleigh and thought he had struck stone. . . . "Was that you, Per Hansa?"

"Ha-ha! You're damned right! That was my flyin oxen passing your good-for-nothing old plugs."

—But where, in Heaven's name, had he been in the mea while?—asked everyone at once.

—Yes, they had better wonder about that! . . . P Hansa was gay once more; he tipped up the bowl rakishl and tried to squeeze another drop out of it.

"If you want to know, I took a little run up to Flandrea to see if I couldn't find a good-looking bride for Henry. thought that was the least I could do for him, poor fellov His brother can handle such matters for himself, it seem . . . Tell me, Sam, are you still as cold as all that?"

Sam blushed crimson and hitched his chair away from th girl.

Later a large bowl of porridge was set out on the tab for Per Hansa, a mug of hot milk beside it. He ate and ate it seemed as if he never could get enough. . . . Afterwar there was much cozy talk, everyone in the house joining in they discussed all that had happened so far, and all that wa going to happen. . . . Oh, this country had a great futur People who were willing to work could win almost any thing out of it! No doubt about that at all!

At last it came time for them to retire. The members family lay down in their beds; the strangers slept on floor, which had been piled deep with hay and covered many thicknesses of clothes; all four men lay there by side, and three of them soon slept the quiet sleep of ighteous. . . .

ut Per Hansa could not sleep; his mind was numb with iness, yet he could not sleep. Every nerve of his body twitching; little spasms passed over him, like ripples on surface of a smooth, glassy sea. It was very hot in the ; the blanket grew so heavy that he had to throw it off. ething remained still frozen, deep down in the centre is being.

certain picture stood stubbornly before his mind: a house beset by the western storm, a hut with the wind ling around the corners; he could even hear the peculiar that the wind always made as it sucked around one of e corners. The hut lay far, far out in the heart of the ness. A woman was moving about there whose sad was still full of beauty; she carried a child in her arms. Hansa's weary, wide-open eyes could see exactly how held the child. . . . It lay wrapped in a blanket—a red ket with black borders. . . . He turned over heavily y times, trying to blot out the vision; but the woman inued to pace up and down. He felt that he must speak er, let her know that all was well—tell her to go to bed , so that a fellow might have a little peace. . . .

. . "God Almighty!" sighed Per Hansa. "How Beret t be worrying about me to-night! . . . She ought not to o foolish. I've told her many times that there are no people in the world than these Trönders." . . . But his kept on jerking; his mind would not let the picture . . . It must be cold in her hut to-night. . . . If the had only managed to bring enough wood into the house re the storm broke! . . . Surely they must have some , or she would not be walking the floor; it would be ble for her in the cold. . . . He threshed and turned, but picture followed him. . . .

VIII

Along the Sioux River, both above and below Simo Baarstad's place, there was already a considerable settl ment, made up almost entirely of Trönders. For those da it was a well-organized community. Some of the folk wh lived there thought of themselves as old settlers already; th first had come in '66. Most of them had a good start no were living in fair-sized frame houses, possessed a good de of land under cultivation, and were making a comfortab living.

And what adventures they were able to relate about th first few years! How they had had to cross the region th is now the southern part of South Dakota and go still farth westward into Nebraska, to have their wheat ground at th mill; how the Indians had come by in large bands, bot winter and summer; and all about many other remarkab things. . . . Now there weren't any hardships or difficultie to be met with, said the Trönders; now there were peop everywhere, the country was fairly settled, and town aft town had sprung up out of the prairie.

Per Hansa liked to listen to these stories. There wa about them a certain flavor of genuineness and reliabilit as of human experience, and at the same time somethin that stirred his heart and made his cheeks burn. . . . Surel the things that a Trönder could do were not impossible fo a Helgelænding! In olden times it had never been so, an it would not prove to be so to-day, either. . . . "Just wa awhile!" . . .

The next day was clear and still, but bitterly cold. Pe Hansa, who on his first trip the previous summer had bough an acre of woodland from Baarstad on time payment, re mained on his own lot, felling trees and loading his sleigh the others went around to different places, buying what woo they could find. . . . The four men stayed in the settlemen two whole days, and did not leave for home until the morn ing of the third day. By hurrying, they might have set ou a day earlier, but to hurry seemed almost impossible.

Jo, it was hard for them to hurry. In many months they seen few strange faces; this visit was too much fun to short. And the Trönders, who were a hospitable folk had a long story to tell, would not hear of their leaving ner. . . . The four were easily tempted. These were al days; the strain of life had relaxed for a moment; there were a thousand things to consult the Trönders ut. Before they left they had ordered all the wheat and ; they would need for the spring seeding. Tönseten had n bought half a sack of barley, a fact which he care- y concealed from his comrades. . . . It would be soon ugh to tell them when the time came, he thought. The nders knew how to make good beer from barley, and had received careful instruction from Tommaas. . . . t wait till fall came around!

Per Hansa, when he had finished making up his load of d, wanted to try his luck on the river. He coaxed rstad until the latter consented to go with him. The two n went at it with a will, chopping their way through the k ice, while the sweat rolled from their foreheads.

And then Trönder and Helgelænding fished together ugh the same hole, in the greatest comradeship and with keenest enjoyment.[1] . . . At night there was fresh fish the table, and the two old fishermen sat eating and rejoic- while they told tales of both East and West Lofoten and got everything around them as they went back into the t. Per Hansa thought that Baarstad was the finest fellow had met for many a long day, and Baarstad felt the same y about Per Hansa. For the twentieth time now he had ed him not to wait too long before he visited them again. As they sat there chatting, a boy came in to speak with the of the family. He seemed to be in hot haste, that boy— ost as if it were a matter of life and death.

—What was going on? asked Baarstad.

—Oh, Tommaas had company at his house, and they were going to have a little fun to-night. The girl bustled about got herself ready, and went away with him.

[1] During the winter seasons at Lofoten, the two clans, the Trönders the Helgelændings, had from time immemorial fought many a er fight.

Then it occurred to Baarstad that they might as well go too. He told his wife to hurry up and get ready. . . . "We'll show these Helgelændings how Trönders can dance!"

Awhile later the three arrived at the Tommaas house. As they opened the door, sounds of a scraping fiddle, mingled with the loud tramping of feet, poured out into the frosty night. The house was packed full of people, both young and old. . . . A small lamp with a homemade shade, sitting on a log well up on the wall, tried to keep an eye on all the couples below; but the task was too heavy for such a weak glim. It had to be content with blinking down on the nearest pair. . . . The three newcomers found themselves quickly shoved into a corner, out of the wake of the dancers.

Per Hansa grew restless as he watched, though his restlessness was far different from that which had kept him awake the other night. . . . Remarkable how that fiddle sang! He had to admit that the man who played knew his business, even if he was a Trönder! . . .

"Well, I'll be——!" The exclamation had jumped out of Per Hansa before he could stop it. Here came the Solum boy, swinging past him with the Baarstad girl! . . . "Oh yes, he'll be a man, that Sam, if he keeps this up!" . . . Another couple came rocking past—he ought to know that fellow, if he would only stop whirling around. By God it was Tönseten, tossing along with an apple-round Trönder woman! . . .

"Careful now, Syvert, old man! There are rocks and breakers ahead of you! What do you think Kjersti would——"

"Shut your mouth, Per Hansa! What are you standing there moping about?" Tönseten's face was fiery red; the dance whirled him away before he had time to say anything more.

Per Hansa began to breathe hard and fast; his eyes snapped with excitement, narrowing to little slits. Right in the midst of a flock of dancers a big head bobbed up and rn, up and down, above all the others, like a buoy on a n sea. . . . Then Per Hansa completely forgot himself.

- all the frolicking seraphims, there's Hans Olsa dancing sschottische!" . . . Waves of spasmodic twitching passed r him, in time to the jigging tune; his eyes blinked rapidly.
. He looked around for the Baarstads, saw them close and, and grasped Gurina's arm.
Come, show me how the Trönders dance that tune!"
orgotten was everything else now. With his arm around rina, he manœuvred toward the centre of the floor until had reached his neighbour's side. . . . "Get out of the
, Hans Olsa! I want plenty of room to swing in!" . . .
t exactly eleven o'clock the party was over; Tommaas self commanded them to stop. . . . No one knew how me about, but, strangely enough, it was Sam who brought Baarstad girl home. . . .
he next morning, long before daylight, the four men left the settlement and were on their way back to Spring ek.

IX

unday afternoon . . . a dim, lurid day . . . a pale sun ering through the drifting snow . . . an everlasting d . . . the whole prairie a foaming, storm-beaten sea.
. Nothing else, to the very ends of the world. . . . The dogs were still on guard, one ahead of the sun, the other owing. . . .
he whole settlement was gathered in Tönseten's hut that rnoon; a gloomy restlessness had taken hold of them, so they could not stay at home. Per Hansa had bundled newcomer up and taken him over; that completed the call. . . . Kjersti was serving potato coffee, with potato es; but for the coffee to-day she had fresh cow's milk, ch made it not so bad, and her store of loaf sugar wasn't rely gone. . . . Inside the hut the lurid daylight cast a , sickly gleam. From out the stove, with its crackling bright streamers of warmer light played about the room.

A heavy mood lay on the folk—too heavy for potat coffee to dispel. . . . It was such a terrible, hopeless da out-of-doors . . . and all the days were alike. . . .

Under the strain of this winter the courage of the men wa slowly ebbing away. . . . As they sat cooped up in Tön seten's house, they were discussing the question of how thi place would look in two years, or maybe in four years—o even after six years had passed. See how many had com last year—this roomful, where the year before there wasn' a living soul! Wouldn't it be reasonable to expect that a equal number of new settlers would turn up another year They began to figure it out on this basis: next year so many in four years such a number; until at last the country woul be filled up and the folk would stretch, neighbour to neigh bour, clear out to the Rocky Mountains! They foresaw th whole process and calculated correctly—but no one in tha company believed in the calculation! They heard themselve speak, and listened to one another, but all realized that ther was no fire in their words. . . .

"I don't believe Per Hansa is ready himself to swallow that story," thought Hans Olsa, but he raised no objection . . . "God save them from making mistakes in their figur ing!" ran through Kjersti's mind, as she listened in awe t Per Hansa and Syvert rolling up the total; but she wa careful to throw no cold water on the dream.

. . . On a day like this it was impossible to believe in su fine fancies; they all felt it, deep down in their hearts.

But here came Tönseten with a question that made the forget everything else for a while. The conversation ha died of its own inertia; no one could find a thought tha seemed worth expressing. Then Tönseten straightened u where he sat on the chest, demanding to know what name Hans Olsa and Per Hansa intended to adopt when the took out the title deeds to their land.

"Names?"

"Yes, names! . . . That point would have to be settle clearly beforehand," Tönseten explained. "When the deed were taken out, their names would then be written into th of the land, and thereafter would be as unchangeable the Constitution itself!"

. . But they all had been baptized! How about Tönen himself? asked Per Hansa, irritably. He couldn't unstand why the name Peder Hansen would not be good ugh even for the United States Constitution. . . . This bbish fastidiousness of Syvert's didn't fit the case.

Tönseten bridled at once and said that sarcasm was ued for. He was only, in the capacity of an old American zen, giving good advice on matters which he underod perfectly. . . . "That's all!" . . . And when Tönseten ew the phrase, "That's all!" into his conversation, they w that he was offended. . . . Besides, he went on stiffly, eemed as if anyone ought to be able to understand this ch: Hans Olsen and Peder Hansen—why, either a Greek a Hebrew might bear those names! It would never occur anyone who heard them that they were carried by Norgian people![1] . . .

Hans Olsa laughed good-naturedly, and said with quiet mour: "Then perhaps I had better call myself Olav gvason. . . . Wasn't there some one of that name?"

This made everyone laugh: Hans Olsa's shaft had suddenly n a rift in their mood of depression.

"Well, well," chuckled Per Hansa, "if you want to be av Trygvason, I'll be Peter Tordenskjold! But then ll have to rechristen Syvert, too . . . St. Olaf or Tore

[1] The practice of changing surnames has gone on extensively with Norwegian-American. Among the common folk in Norway it is e customary even yet for the son to take his surname from his ner's first name; the son of Hans must be Hansen or Hanson. ewise the girl; if she is the daughter of Hans, her surname beies Hansdatter (Hans' daughter), which she retains even after rriage. When the Norwegians became independent landowners in erica their slumbering sense of the historical fitness of things oke, and so many of them adopted the name of the place they had e from in the old country. Hence the many American names now ing in —dahl, —fjeld, —gaard, —stad, etc. As the Swedes, and Danes, too, had so many Hansens and Olsens and Johnsons, the nge was really a very practical one.

Hund.[1] How would that do, Hans Olsa? . . . If tha wouldn't proclaim to both Jew and Gentile that we are goo Norwegians, then I'm certainly up a stump!" . . .

They were all laughing so hard now that Tönseten had t join them in spite of himself. . . . Then Kjersti and Sörin took up the question; the Solum boys chimed in and ex pressed their opinions; while the children were busy di cussing it among themselves. But Beret sat quietly rockin the baby on her lap, and said nothing.

An earnest liveliness crept into the conversation. Opinion flew thick and fast. At last Sörine spoke up resolutely, as she had made up her mind, saying that if she had her choi she would rather be called Mrs. Vaag, from their place nam in Norway, than Mrs. Olsen.

This sounded so sensible and practical that all the other had to try the idea at once, with their own place names.

"But, look here, Sörrina," objected Per Hansa, "tha wouldn't do for my wife! Your notion would make he Mrs. Skarvholmen[2]—and that nobody shall call her! warn you!"

"No, that certainly wouldn't do for a Christian woman! cried Kjersti with a hearty laugh.

"No, I suppose not," admitted Sörine, unwilling to giv up. "But how about Mrs. Holm? That seems to me bot pretty and practical. . . . I say, Beret, shall we all tur Baptists for a while?" . . . Sörine was laughing in her joll way, immensely taken up with the idea.

Beret sat rocking the child. She had listened absently a the while, humming a quiet melody to herself. When Sörin addressed her directly she stopped singing and answered tha it made little difference to her, if—she choked, and wer

[1] Olav Trygvason, King of Norway (995-1000); St. Olaf, Norway martyr king (1016-1030); Peter Tordenskjold, the great naval her (1690-1720); Tore Hund, St. Olaf's slayer. These names are house hold words with every emigrant Norwegian.

[2] Skarv in this compound means cormorant—a rather nasty-lookin sea bird; the word is often used in an adjectival sense about a dea beat or person of low moral qualities. Holmen means the holm Hence Skarvholmen—the holm of the cormorant.

—if it was right for a person to take a name other than the given in baptism. . . . But it made no difference to her. Sörine grew serious over this point.

I agree with you, Beret. . . . But here in this country can't bear our fathers' names, anyway. It wouldn't do me to sign my name as Sörine Sakkarias'-Daughter!"

"No," cried Tönseten, excitedly, "not if you want to be as Olsa's wife!" . . . Remarkable what a bright head sat Sörrina's shoulders!

This matter of names brought on a long discussion. Hans n, like the others, decided that his wife had made a prac- suggestion; Per Hansa found little to say, but his face a look of quiet elation. . . . He must speak to Beret ut this, alone and right away! . . . He sat there trying name over in his mind, first on her, then on himself, lly on each of the children. As he ran them over, the ant light in his face grew stronger. . . . Mrs. Holm, that nded well; Peder Holm, that had a fine ring! . . . Ole Hor Holm! . . . Hans Kristian Holm! . . . Peder Holm o, Peder Victorious Holm! . . . Peder Victorious Holm!

He rolled the name on his tongue, biting it off in three nct parts, as if to enjoy the sound; then he got up sud- y, grasped the waistband of his trousers, and gave them rch.

. . "Sörrina has got it right—that name is both pretty practical. What do you say, boys—shall we adopt the ?"

er Hansa was plainly in a towering humour now; the of it rang in his voice. There was no opposing him.

After that day, each of the two families in question had ir of surnames. Among themselves they always used the names, but among strangers they were Vaag and Holm—gh Hans Olsa invariably wrote it with a "W" instead of V."

hat night Beret sat quietly by herself. The chores were since done and they had eaten their supper. The chil- n were in bed. They had been very noisy to-night, in their excitement over the new name that Sörine had invente for them. But now they were all asleep. Per Hansa wa getting ready to go to bed; he moved about abstractedly ar took a long time over everything he did. He, too, was fu of excitement, thinking about the name. . . .

Peder Victorious Holm—the words sang through his mind he seemed to expand as he heard them. The song carrie him forward into the great, imaginative future where h loved to dwell. . . . "Beret, please come to bed!" he begge in a low, kindly voice. He caressed his wife affectionatel then went to the bed and lay down.

She returned the caress half-heartedly, as if reserving th better part of it. "Oh yes, I'll come pretty soon," she sai and remained sitting where she was.

She sat there a long time, holding the child in her lap an rocking it gently. Now and then she would open the stov door and stick in a piece of wood. Each time she left th door open a crack, so that she could stare in at the fire. Wh did she have to go to bed? The night was long enough, any way! . . . Well, now they had discarded the names of thei fathers, soon they would be discarding other sacred thing The awful spirit that ruled the plains demanded all! . . She had said nothing to-day. Why should she interfere, t spoil their pleasure? . . . Everything that she said, every thing that she did, seemed to be wrong. . . . But, oh, was a wicked thing that they were doing now! Not that was any worse than giving the child that terrible second nam to start with; for that had been almost sacrilege! . . . Bu perhaps she was mistaken, after all. Perhaps it hadn't bee wrong. Perhaps she was going crazy. The old fear ha come back to her to-day—that was why she had kept stil . . . Ah, well, God Almighty had spared her again; He mus have some reason for it. . . . Now she could repent of he sins before He took her . . . He had been merciful enoug to give her time for that. . . . But sitting here in this moo she found it impossible to repent. She was only afraid— afraid . . . a timid child in a dark room.

The fire had burned out, but she hadn't noticed it until ght of frosty air began to circulate through the room. t once she shivered. . . . The memory of that stormy some time ago came back to her vividly. The children been over at Sörine's; they had not come home and she been unable to go and fetch them. All that night she walked the floor—walked and walked, until she could no longer. . . . And the following two nights had been etter. . . . Again she was overwhelmed by the terror had visited her at that time. . . . She got up hastily and o the bed. . . .

ut there was no sleep waiting for her. . . .

o, Beret could not sleep. She lay tense and quiet, think- of people she had read about, who had been driven out the desert that they might better please God. After a e she wept silently. If He would only remove the terror hung like a dark cloud over all this land, she would try fully to serve Him even here. But under the shadow at terror she could not live much longer. . . .

X

he days were growing longer with every one that passed. ch came, and the winter seemed to be letting up a little. Hansa worked with a desperate energy. If the day was short for what he was doing, he simply added a part he night to it. And in the month of March he achieved ething that is still told about in the legends of that set- ent.

very time he had visited the Trönders at Sioux River, he heard fascinating tales about the Indians at Flandreau, re they had a large colony. Their whole winter occupa- was trapping, from fall frost to spring thaw, and when ng came they would have large stocks of furs, especially krat, though they also trapped mink, fox, and an occa- al wolf. They sold the skins wherever they could find arket, and took whatever they could get; but their best es were no more than a fourth of what the same skins ld bring in eastern Minnesota. The price of a muskrat skin was ten cents in this district—never more than ten cen while in Austin, Minnesota, it would sell for as high as fi cents. . . . A few people along the river had taken to buyi furs from the Indians, and shipping them into Minnesota.

All these facts Per Hansa had heard more than once, a he brooded over them a good deal. Throughout the win they had been constantly on his mind, but he had said nothi about it to anyone. Now March had come, there must be great supply of furs stored up at Flandreau, and prices wou be running high in Minnesota. . . . The railroad ran e from Worthington. . . . Every day he went about thinki of it; at night he slept with the idea; and all the while grew more silent and irritable.

There were many things to consider—it wasn't an ea matter! . . . The plan that was slowly forming in his mi was to go alone and trade with the Indians, making wh profit he could. God knows, he needed it! . . . And wh was to hinder? Flandreau lay only forty miles away; fro there to Worthington was perhaps another ninety miles; a there at Worthington stood the train, waiting for him! . The days were growing longer; there was nothing to do home for a while; and the weather wouldn't be too bad f a journey. . . . Here were the furs; in Minnesota lay t profits. Any courageous devil could pull it off. . . . Ped Victorious—the name sang in his ears. Peder Victorious!

. . . But he had only five dollars in his pocket! . . . taking Hans Olsa into the project there would be plenty capital; that fellow wasn't down to hardpan yet. . . . St he couldn't be certain that Hans Olsa would look with favo on such a wild-goose chase. On the other hand, how cou he take Hans Olsa and leave out Tönseten? . . . It would a mean trick to shove him out in the cold. . . . And if t three of them were to join forces, one of the Solum bo would have to be in it, too—Henry, most likely, for he w much more mature than his brother. . . . But that wou close the school. . . . And if everyone went, there would a terrific protest; the women were all more or less timid a naturally didn't want to be left alone. . . .

o, he couldn't seem to hit on the right solution. . . . But as a thundering pity for that money to lie right at his —and he in need of another quarter-section of land, with berless things besides! . . .

ne first week of March went by.

ne morning Per Hansa got up a little earlier than usua looked out at the weather. . . . Turning to Beret, he that this couldn't go on any longer, and stood waiting her to ask what it was that couldn't go on any longer. But as she made no reply, he had to take up his own v. Seeding time would soon be here—and he hadn't a y in the world. . . . They needed many other things, a t many, both food and clothes. . . . It was time for him nink of some way of earning a few extra dollars. . . . couldn't see any other way out of it.

s Beret listened, her heart tightened with apprehension; still she made no answer.

nen he told her about the Indian colony at Flandreau and a fellow could easily earn a few dollars there. . . . In springtime those Indians did a rousing business, so the nders had said! . . . Didn't she think it would be a good for him to go up to Flandreau and look around? . . . rasn't far away. . . . While he was asking these ques- s he did not look at her. Still receiving no answer, he t on hurriedly: Didn't she suppose she could manage with the boys at home for a little while? The days were get- fairly long now and things were looking better all nd. . . . His voice trailed off into silence.

eret stared vacantly out of the window. She thought: as true that they needed much; they needed everything people ought to have. Most of all they needed clothes him and the boys. She had nothing more left to patch . . . .

. . "I suppose we'll have to try to keep alive as long as can. . . ."

hat made him very happy. . . . Wisely said! He ght so, too. And now, never fear, they were going to a solution! . . .

She caught the note of suppressed excitement in his voic
. . . No wonder he was eager to get away! If he woul only think of the fact that others felt the same desire!

. . . "When are you going?"

. . . "Well now, Beret, I hadn't made up my mind. Bu if you think it's all right, I'd better set out to-day! I' going to take the pony that the Indian gave me. Th weather looks steady enough. . . . You'll have to take goo care of that newcomer of ours!" . . .

This last remark might better have been left unsai thought Beret bitterly; but still she made no answer.

Half an hour later Per Hansa took his departure.

Late at night he reached Flandreau, found his way into hut, and so saved his life for that night. . . . As soon as h had fed the pony the next morning he took it along with hi and poked around the village to interview the Indians. H searched every face; but the one he was looking for an hoping to find was not among them. The savages watche him curiously, returning his stares. They recognized th pony, and seemed to know who Per Hansa was, too. H noticed this quickly and felt relieved. "This scheme is goin to work out all right," he thought. . . . Then he followe
the plan that he had formed long ago when he had first begu to think about it. Trusting wholly to his instincts, he selecte out of the crowd the face that he liked best, beckoned th Indian forward, and uttered the one word, "Fur." As h did this, he gazed inquiringly into the man's face, but kindl too, as if to inspire confidence in him.

The Indian understood at once. Of course he had plent of furs! He took Per Hansa into his wigwam and showe him several bundles of fine muskrat skins. . . .

Per Hansa laughed at his success. With the stick he ca ried in his hand he wrote the figures "10" in the snow, an after them the word "cents." Then he drew an object whic was meant to be a man with a bundle on his back. H pointed first to the drawing, then to the figures, and at la made a vigourous gesture toward the Indian; this amuse him very much, and he couldn't help smiling as he wer

ugh the motions. But all the honesty of his heart man- to come out in that smile, and the Indian saw it. . . . ng period of bargaining followed, with many gestures, much drawing and writing to be done in the snow. The ot of it was that he bought as many furs as he judged he ld be able to carry away. He arranged them in four lles and hung them pack-fashion over the pony's back.

Per Hansa was still laughing when he left Flandreau. Well now, forward, in God's name!" he said to himself, ing his course toward the southeast, in the general direc- of a hut where lived a couple of Hallings who used cows breaking prairie.

e was gone for a whole week on this expedition. When st he reached home he refused to tell how far he had elled into Minnesota, or what experiences he had met on the way. He was worn out and disturbed; such tales better be left untold where folks were so easily fright- .. . . . But he had brought home many of the things they ed—and even so, there were forty dollars left in his et! These he gayly counted out on the table for Beret, ing to amuse her.

e remained at home two days. On the third day he left n. . . . "Understand, Beret, I've got to go and pay the an for his furs! . . . Now, don't expect me until you see neave in sight!"

ll together, Per Hansa made three such journeys; the last took him only six days each; if there hadn't been other sing things to attend to, he probably would have made a rth journey. When it was all over he was able to lay hundred and forty dollars on the table for Beret; besides he had brought things for the house on each trip— gs that he knew she went about wishing for.

e had returned from the last journey with two frozen . These were giving him a good deal of trouble when nd the other men were forced to make the trip to the nders' for the seed. . . . It was necessary to get it home e the sleighing lasted; he was not even properly rested n they had to set off.

On that trip he went in company with Hans Olsa. He ha a feeling that since they were going so far anyway, he oug to accomplish something besides their immediate erran Casting his eyes around at Sioux River, he bought a on year-old heifer from Gurina Baarstad. . . . The heifer wa spotted red and white, and was therefore given the name o "Spotty" as soon as he reached home with her.

In all this going and coming Beret had said very littl either when he set out or when he returned. He couldn help feeling the strangeness of it; she had recovered fro her illness long ago, and seemed quite well, as far as he coul understand. . . . She might at least have told him that no he was getting on like a man! . . . She would have acte differently if she had known, for instance, how he had ridde one time until he had nearly fallen from his horse wit fatigue! And once or twice he had escaped death by a prett narrow squeak—he had thought that his time had come. Bu then—better not tell her such things! . . . If she would onl say something brave and tender to him! . . . "Ah, well, sh would probably be in better spirits when spring and fin weather set in!" . . .

The Power of Evil in High Places

I

PER HANSA and the boys sat around the table, sifting the seed; the wheat lay spread in small heaps on the white cloth. This was important work and must be ne with the greatest care; every little weed seed and other reign substance had to be gleaned out. The seed must be an, so the Trönders had cautioned Per Hansa; and now he s attending to it soberly, with infinite pains. If he found hrunken or damaged kernel, he straightway threw it out—ank you, not that! The best only for new soil! . . . Full rnels will make the bin bulge. . . . "Be careful, boys! Be reful, there! Don't shirk your job!"

It was wonderful to be sitting here playing with these mp, precious kernels; never before had Per Hansa been absorbed in a task of this kind, yet it made him thoughtful, o. . . . Here, then, was the start! These few sacks of ain would not only supply him and his family with all the neat flour they needed for a whole year, but would raise any bright dollars as well, a great store of riches. . . . And ore than that, seed for the next year, seed again for the ar after, and thus down through all the years to come. . . . nd always greater and greater abundance of food for the or, the world over. . . . Here he sat playing with the good iries that had the power to create a new life over this End-ss Wilderness, and transform it into a habitable land for man beings. Wasn't it wonderful?

He began to think of the possibility of selling seed next ar. No doubt there would be many new settlers by then, ho would stand in need of such things. If he could only ford it, he would store the whole crop—seed wheat brought high prices. . . . Well, he would see; a good many thin might happen as time went on! . . .

And here he held in his hand the very promise of all the wonders which were destined to take place! He recalled hc the fairy tale started: "Once upon a time. . . ." Not mu of a beginning, yet the most startling events would unfold
the story went on—strange, incredible things. . . . Yes, would have to take every precaution with the seed. His fa grew sober at the thought; he spoke in a low tone to the boy repeating the admonition for the hundredth time: "Boy look out, now! Didn't I just tell you to be careful!" . .
His wonder grew as he gazed at the kernels; there they la so inanimate, yet so plump and heavy, glowing with smou dering flame. It was as if each kernel had light within it-life now asleep. He thrust his hand into the sack and toc out a handful of grain; it weighed like lead. As his gra tightened, the kernels seemed to soften under the warmth his hand; they squirmed and twisted, slipping against o another; they seemed to be charged with a delicate life th was seeking release. But when he opened his hand a stirred a finger among the grain, the kernels lay there lifelessly as before—inert, yellowish pale, yet burning faint with inner, golden light. . . . Reverently he lifted handf after handful from the table, and emptied it into the sack.

As the mild spring weather set in, a feverish restlessne seized him; the work on the seed was done and he could n stay indoors. . . . The chickens were laying finely now; I was finding as many as five eggs a day. They'd better beg setting the hens pretty soon; when fall came, they wou have at least fifty fowl on the place! . . . Next minute I was over on the prairie, talking to and caressing the oxe and feeling of their necks where the yoke would lie. . .
Now if the ground would only dry up! Per Hansa looked it the first thing in the morning, and felt of it every nig before he went to bed. To-day it had made fine progres Good God—if the sun would only shine as warm to-mo row! . . . He dashed off to the neighbours, to see how t ground was coming on there. No, it was wetter than at h ce, where the land lay higher. . . . I'll bet my land is ng to be the first to dry up! he told himself.

Beret hadn't seen him in such good spirits since last spring.
walked so lightly; everything that had life he touched h a gentle hand, but talk to it he must; his voice sounded
, yet it thrilled with a vibrant energy; his eyes were wn so narrow that they could hardly be seen. She felt a ce that made her tremble, emanating from him; she tried keep out of his way as much as she could.
And now the sun bore down on the prairie the whole live-g day. Bright and quivering in the forenoon, he swam ough endless seas of blue; across the hazy afternoon he med caressingly; toward evening he opened wide his ntenance; then the flood of light grew refulgent, only to in splendour against a mysterious night which also had
.

As the fine weather continued, Per Hansa became more tless, but it only seemed to fill him with greater joy. Sudnly he would be up by the field. Wasn't it dry enough yet?
. He ought to have had the seeding all done by now; it s high time to begin breaking new ground.
On the 14th of April, the Sommermaalsdag of his old herland, Per Hansa began seeding the wheat. Three es that forenoon he had been out to test the ground; the t time he made his great decision: Now we will start!
No sooner had he finished the noon meal than he rushed , grabbed the seed bag that he had made for this occasion, l carried two sacks of seed up to that portion of the field ere the ground was driest. He had paced off the whole d into one-acre lots, and marked each plot. One and one-f bushels of seed to the acre was the regular measure; but non Baarstad had told him that on really first-class break-, provided the soil was unusually excellent, one and onearter bushels might do; and Per Hansa had decided to try latter amount.
He filled the seed bag, hung it over his shoulder, and was dy. His whole body shook. He paused for an instant and nced about the settlement. . . . Yes, sir, he was the first,

the very first one! There was Hans Olsa hauling manure his garden patch. . . . That's smart of you, Hans Ols
. . . Down to the southward he caught sight of Tönset pottering around his yard. . . . So much for you! .
Then he turned to look in a northerly direction. . . . I
God, if the Solum boys hadn't already started breaking! .
Muttering, "Well, well, well," he strode over to the edge
the field and stuck his hand into the bag.

But just at that moment both boys appeared on the de run; they had discovered what their father was up to, a wanted to watch the show.

"Go home!" shouted Per Hansa. "Go home! Do y hear me?"

"Why can't we stand here and watch?" the boys remo strated, their faces gloomy with disappointment.

"Go home this instant! . . . I don't want you tramp around here, carrying off this precious seed on your shoes
. . . He suddenly realized that it was very wrong of him be so harsh with the boys in an hour like this. When spoke again, his voice had grown kinder: "Sowing wheat such a particular job—each kernel has to lie exactly the wa it falls. Be good now, boys, and go straight home—and th first to wake up to-morrow morning shall start the dragging I'll see to it that one of you covers as much ground as th other—but the first to wake shall start!" . . . With th promise the boys had to be content; they went off homewa in a rebellious mood.

Again Per Hansa thrust his hand into the bag and h fingers closed on the grain. He felt profoundly that th greatest moment of his life had come. Now he was about sow wheat on his own ground! His hand tightened in th bag; he was on the point of lifting it out, when somethi queer happened—the kernels were running out between h fingers! He gave another grab, closing his hand still tighte again the yellow kernels slipped through his fingers li squirming eels. Then Per Hansa threw back his head a laughed. These fellows aren't very anxious to go into t ground after riches for me! . . . He ran his hand around bag, stroking the grain caressingly, taking great handfuls giving them a gentle squeeze.

. . . And now the wheat rained down in yellow semicircles m Per Hansa's hand; as the seed fell, the warm rays of sun struck full across it, and seemed to wrap it in golden tt. . . . Per Hansa restrained himself, working slowly carefully—the seeding must be even and not too thick. almost at once he grew very heated; his body was drip- g with sweat. He couldn't explain this for a while; it n't hard work at all. Oh, well, he thought at last—that's ays the way when you tackle a job you don't understand! ate in the afternoon Tönseten came running up the hill, ard that his heels seemed to be flying over his head.

"What in hell are you starting here, Per Hansa?" he de- nded, breathlessly.

"Can't you see?" laughed Per Hansa; but he hardly dared ook at his neighbour, for fear he would lose his marks.

Tönseten stared at him in amazement. "You're plumb zy, man, and I don't mind telling you so! . . . The und isn't half dry enough yet for that—the soil is too ! Why, damn it all, there's a foot of frost in the ground! . . . Much good it will do you to throw away all that seed!" . . . Into this last, Tönseten threw all the scorn of the man o really knows; in fact, he felt too seriously disturbed to r another syllable; so, having done his duty and delivered ominous message, he turned on his heel and stalked ma- ically away.

As long as the daylight lasted, Per Hansa kept on seeding. . . After supper he sat at the table without moving; he n't want to get up; a pleasant feeling of languorous ex- stion had settled on him, the reaction from his excite nt. And-Ongen crawled up into his lap and begged for a y, but got no response; the boys came storming in, de- nding that he call them both at the same time to-morrow rning. . . . No, he said in a dreamy, abstracted voice, t wouldn't do; there wasn't any hurry; better let the sun e time to warm up the ground a bit before they covered grain. But the bargain still held; the one who turned out first, yoked the oxen and hitched them to the drag, he w to start the dragging! "And now," he added, rising fr the table, "I'll tell you this, boys—if we are any good at we'll have the whole field seeded and dragged by the ti the porridge is on the table to-morrow night!"

The next day Per Hansa worked like one possessed. N that he had at last caught the trick with the seeding, he ma fine progress. When evening fell that day he had finish his task, while the boys had done almost as well, with o the oats left to drag. . . . Per Hansa walked home that nig in great satisfaction. Now he had turned a fine trick— was through seeding and dragging before his neighbours h even thought of beginning the regular spring work! .

II

When Per Hansa left the house next morning to finish t dragging, the air was raw and heavy; a penetrating wi blew over the prairie, as if searching for signs of life wither and blight; not a trace remained of the mildness a pleasantness of the previous days.

Before he had finished covering the oats, the rain began fall; along with the rain came huge flakes of snow, floati silently down and turning to slush as they struck the grou After a while the rain ceased, but the snow only came fast the flakes were firmer now, and fell in a businesslike mann Before long a veritable blizzard was raging over the wh prairie—there had hardly been anything worse that wint

Throughout that day and the following night the sto continued with unabated fury. Early on the next morni the weather cleared; but now the cold was so intense tha nipped the skin as soon as one stuck one's head out-of-doo Spring seemed a thousand miles off.

That night Per Hansa did not sleep a wink. How could sleep, with this tragedy going on? He was nothing but an sailor; he didn't know the least thing about farming. G Almighty! hadn't he good reason to lie awake? . . . H he had gone to work and wasted all his precious seed—h ply thrown it away, because he was foolish and hasty! l there wasn't even a chance to extricate himself from the s he had made! Out in the field, under the snow, lay all priceless wheat, smothered to death and frozen as hard lint. . . . He could stand the loss of the oats, perhaps— God! the wheat! Twenty-five bushels he had sacrificed, he work gone to no purpose, and no possible way of get- a fresh supply of seed. . . . As he opened the door that rning, saw two feet of snow covering the ground, and the bitter cold stinging his face, he had an irresistible ulse to fling himself down in the snowdrift and cry like aby! . . .

He turned around, came into the hut again, and lay down the bed. . . . No, he didn't want any breakfast! He uted out the words. All the forenoon he lay silent and ionless. When noon came and he refused to eat any din- Beret went to the bed and asked him what was the tter. Did he feel sick? But he only turned his face to wall, muttering hoarsely that those who felt like eating better do so. Leave him alone; he'd be all right again— e time. . . . Beret began to feel concerned about him; r a while she brought him a bowl of soup, but he only up in bed and commenced to find fault with her like an easonable child. . . . For God's sake, couldn't she leave alone? He had told her he didn't want anything to eat, wasn't that enough? . . . Well, then . . . Oh, hell! . . . n the afternoon the sun shone strong and brilliant, but the l was too intense for it to make any impression on the w. . . . Per Hansa was still lying in bed; the bright sun e outside, reflecting on the white walls of the room, med to sear his eyeballs; he felt that the only thing that ld give him relief would be to get up, strike out wildly, curse everything around him—for he was fighting an un- n enemy. . . . He had come to his great decision; he had e the seeding; he had felt clearly that it was the most mentous day of his life; but no sooner had the last kernel en to the ground than the very powers of heaven had ped down to defeat him! . . . Powers of heaven . . . ?

A certain image came before his eyes, and would not go awa
One Sunday not very long ago, Store-Hans had sat by t
table reading to his mother; Per Hansa remembered vividly, because the words had sounded so awful to him.
last he had gotten up to look over the boy's shoulder; Sto Hans was reading in a loud voice, throwing great empha into the words:

"And the Lord said unto Satan, whence comest tho Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to a fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. . .

The words would not go away. Per Hansa fell to repe ing them. . . . And that night as he lay wide awake, tossi restlessly on the bed, he thought that he saw a beam just side the door of the stable . . . and there was a rope. .
Well, if that fellow was after him, he might as well give u
. . . Sweat broke out on his body . . . the beam and t rope beckoned him . . . they seemed to call to him! . . .

The snow went faster than anyone would have believed;
began to settle on the day after the weather had cleared, gr soft toward evening, and the next day's sun took all of away. It seemed to leave very little water; within a sh while the ground was drier than before. . . . And now ca days when the warm, bright sunshine filled everything tween heaven and earth. As the sun sank, he left part of heat behind him; the nights grew soft and balmy, and stirr with mysterious life. . . . At length evenings so sweet a beautiful began to visit the prairie, that, as the saying is, de men might willingly step out of their graves and walk abo
But all this could not alter the fact that Per Hansa's precio seed grain lay over there in the field, ruined by frost a snow—those marvellous, pregnant kernels, so delicate a sensitive. . . . Damn the luck! . . .

One day as Per Hansa was pottering about out-of-doo hardly knowing which way to turn, he caught sight of Töns ten, who had commenced his seeding. Like a condemned m about to be executed Per Hansa walked over. . . . Tönset is an aboriginal American, he thought, bitterly. I might well let him polish off the damned fool of a newcomer!

ut to-day Tönseten was too busy even to talk. Per Hansa n't feel inclined to open up the subject of his own troubles; began on a different tack, to head the other off:
I must say you certainly sow it even!"
önseten spat a prodigious distance. . . . "You think so?"
. But he didn't stop for a moment; his arms continued to wide semicircles in the air; golden grain flew out of his d and rained down to the ground through the warm sunt, there to begin the mystic dream of life.
his is beautiful! thought Per Hansa. . . . I couldn't sow s even as that.
I was a fool for not waiting to get you to do the seeding me," he observed.
önseten spat another great mouthful before he answered:
Well, some people are bound to cut off their nose to spite r face. . . . But then—this is a free country, you know!"
. He walked on with measured steps, his arm sweeping in g, graceful curves; the kernels flew far and wide, catch-the sunlight a moment as they fell.
er Hansa turned abruptly, and began to walk toward ne. When Tönseten noticed this, he stopped his work called out:
Did you want anything, Per Hansa?"
Hell—no!"
All right. To-day, you see, I'm a busy man!"
er Hansa started to answer, choked, and continued to k away. His head was in a whirl as he went on toward own field, which seemed to be making faces at him as he w nearer; it was indeed a forbidding countenance that he there, lifeless and black and bare. Reaching the field, he on his knees, dug into the soil, and picked up the first nel he came across; he laid it in the palm of his left hand turned it over and over with the forefinger of his right; seed was black with clammy dirt, which clung tightly to Slowly and carefully he picked off the particles of soil—
there it lay, a pale little thing, greyish-white and dirty, golden sheen through which he had read the fairy tale, rely gone, the magic departed, the seed cold and dead.

Per Hansa dropped it without a word, and dug in the grou until he had found another kernel. The one he now pick up had the same lifeless color, but it was swollen and seem about to burst open. . . . "This is the frost!"—he mumbl hoarsely.—"It's all begun to rot!" . . . He rose to his f and stood there as if chained to the spot, the very personi cation of gloom, gazing out over the face of his dead drea . . . "Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Fr going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and do in it." . . . There can't be much doubt that he's found t place, all right—the devil salt and pickle his guts! . . .

III

Over on the piece of field which Per Hansa had brok during the last few days the boys were now busy at wo with the dragging. He had set them to the task early th morning, but had not yet made up his mind what to put in the field. Now he walked over to them.

One of the boys was driving; the other sat on the harro making grooves with his heels in the loose dirt; on ea round of the field they exchanged places. They had qua relled considerably over who could drive the straightest; n they were trying to decide this momentous question by jud ing the straightness of the grooves made on each round.

The boys stopped as they saw their father approaching.

"Isn't this piece four acres?" Ole demanded, boisterous

"It should be," their father answered in a tired voice.

"All right," beamed Ole. "If we plant potatoes in t whole piece and get a hundred and fifty bushels to t acre, we'll have six hundred bushels in all!"

"Then we'll sell 'em!" Store-Hans broke in, his eye sna ping.

"Shut up, you! This is my idea!" Ole turned again his father and kept on with his arithmetic: "We can't get le than thirty cents a bushel, can we? I'll be able to help y haul them to town. And that'll be exactly one hundred a eighty dollars. Gee! What a lot!" The boy looked proud is father, and added with a grown-up air, "We ought to the potatoes planted at once—that's my opinion!"

ut then Store-Hans had a great inspiration, and flashed

When we get as much money as that, just for potatoes,
I buy a shotgun. Hurrah!"
Stop your nonsense and get to work!" said Per Hansa, hly. "You need a pair of pants to cover your bottom,
e than you do a gun. . . . Move on, now, I tell you!"
n the way home that morning, Per Hansa realized one g more clearly than ever before—unless he could find ething to occupy his body and mind, and find it right
y, he would go all to pieces one of these fine days. . . .
l, why not do as Ole suggested? Here was this piece ew field, and it had to be put to some use. . . . If that w was loose around these parts, Per Hansa might as well him a run for his money! . . .
he minute Per Hansa reached home he opened the root r and began carrying out potatoes. He took out all that udged they could possibly spare and began to cut them nto small pieces; he was determined to have enough seed over the whole field. . . . Oh yes, no doubt this was in-ly foolish, too, but, damn it all, he might as well come ination at once and be done with it! . . .
he planting kept the three of them busy for the rest of week. When Sunday morning came, Per Hansa rose at usual time, ate his breakfast in silence, and then went to bed. And-Ongen crawled into bed with him and ed up a terrible commotion; he must wake now and tell a story. Getting no answer, she pulled his hair and hed his cheek and tugged at his nose. The carrying-on he child made a pleasant diversion for him in his dark
d. Beret sat by the table, reading the Bible. To his t relief, she said little these days. . . . As he lay there ding he was turning over and over in his mind a new —mightn't he make another trip to the Sioux River?
haps he could yet scare up a couple of sacks of wheat
e. The seeding would be far behind-hand, that's true;

but barring any more bad luck, he would at least be able harvest enough seed grain for another year. . . . But it w so late now—too late, really, to think of such a thing. P haps he had better go to Sioux Falls or Worthington a try to get work for the summer. Beret and the boys cou easily get along without him. . . . No, he couldn't qu make up his mind as to what would be best. . . . All t while And-Ongen was pommelling him because he would tell her a story.

Suddenly a violent stamping of feet sounded outside; so one came running up, with another close at his heels.

Ole jerked the door open, took one leap, and landed in t middle of the floor. The boy was wild-eyed with excitemer

"Per Hansa!" he cried, calling his father by name. "T wheat is up!" Then he took another leap and stood leani over the bed. "The wheat is up, I say! . . . Can't you he me?" . . .

But now Store-Hans came storming in, all out of breat

"Father Per Hansa—the wheat is so high!"

"You shut up!" raged his brother. "I came first!"

"I guess I can tell it, too!" Store-Hans paid no furth attention to his brother; he was standing now by the be measuring on his finger. "The wheat is so high, the oa about up to here! . . . Don't you suppose we can buy a sh gun?"

Per Hansa said never a word; he got up, trembling every limb, and put the child aside. In a moment he h left the house and rushed up to the field. There he sto spellbound, gazing at the sight spread before him. His wh body shook; tears came to his eyes, so that he found it dif cult to see clearly. And well he might be surprised. Ov the whole field tiny green shoots were quivering in the war sunshine.

Store-Hans was standing now by his father's side; looked at him in consternation.

"Are you sick, father?"

No answer.

"Why, you're crying!"

You're . . . so—foolish, Store-Hans!" Per Hansa was ing his nose violently. . . . "So terribly foolish!" he ed, softly, and straightened himself up with a new energy. core-Hans now began to feel reassured about his father. boy turned to the field and spoke in a voice thrilled with ght:

sn't it dandy?"

he silence continued for a while longer. But at last his er cleared his throat. "Come here, Store-Hans!" Per sa placed his hand on the boy's shoulder. "What are going to be when you grow up?"

When I grow up?" repeated the boy, wonderingly. ll, a general . . . one like Grant."

er Hansa looked at him, a strange chuckling sound issu- from his throat:

What about being a minister? . . . We need a minister e."

Oh, well," said Store-Hans, indifferently. "I suppose I be that, too. . . . Don't you think we can get a shotgun tty soon?"

er Hansa was a different man when he walked home; the ng had come back to his step. Entering the house, he sat n by his wife, who was still reading the Bible, and said, nptly:

You'd better read us a chapter!" Then he cleared his at and looked around the room. "No more nonsense, s! Come here and sit down quietly while mother reads us."

IV

hat summer many happenings took place in the settle- t by Spring Creek. For those who had been here from beginning, associations were slowly growing up outside he day's work. At the very last of May the Irish arrived, many new land-seekers in their company; they all settled t by the sloughs, so as to have access to water for the le. The first part of June the Vossings and Sognings put into port; they, too, brought many new homesteaders wi them. The latter folk all settled east of the creek, spreadi eastward and southward, to bring them nearer to town. He the soil was first class, too; and Tönseten assured them th water was no problem, if they would dig deep enough. . Water! Why, good Lord! wasn't the whole earth surround by water? . . . Talk sense, folks, and get your houses bui . . . Soon one new sod house after another began to stick i head above the waving grass of the prairie.

Among the Sognings was a tall, heavily built man, wi a light complexion and rather good looking, but loud spok and given to bragging. All his words and actions had a irritating arrogance; he was always right; at times he got o everyone's nerves, because he talked so much and with su cocksureness. Luck had been with him, it seemed; he h received a considerable inheritance from the old countr while living in Minnesota he had cleared much land, whi he had been able to dispose of at a fine price; rumour had that he was worth at least three thousand dollars in cas besides other property; and this report he did not deny. T man had a large family; his name was Torkel Tallaksen.

Not long after the arrival of this man, Store-Hans had fight with one of the Tallaksen boys. It came about in th way: the boys chanced to meet down by the creek one day, they were both out chasing the cattle, Store-Hans riding h pony, the other boy a common old work horse.

"Where did you swipe that pony?" the stranger shoute challengingly.

"I didn't swipe it!"

"Where did you get it, then?"

"Oh, I just got it."

"Can't you tell?"

"Come here, if you want to know."

The two boys dismounted, looked each other over, then s down and fell to talking. Store-Hans was eager to infor this tenderfoot of the mighty things they had done out her he related how the pony had come to be his, giving the sto a picturesque turn whenever he saw the chance. He and h er, he told the stranger, had rescued an Indian chief—it was the highest chief over all the Indians out West.

chief was dying; he was almost dead when they found
. . . What was the matter? Well, there had been a ble battle; the Indian had been desperately wounded—and left for dead. . . . But he and his father had cured and they had received this pony as a reward.

he other boy listened scornfully to the story, said "humph mph" a good many times, and finally declared the whole g to be a lie; people out here were such awful liars, so father had told him! . . .

core-Hans could hardly stand this accusation, for hadn't imself helped in restoring the Indian to life? So without her ado he pitched into the other boy and the fight was It proved a tough battle; clothes were torn and both batants sneezed gore. The bloody noses didn't matter
h, for they could be washed; but it would be more serious ave to explain the tattered shirts. The boys fought it out, ever; finally the newcomer had to admit that truth is h and take back all he had said. This mollified Stores; he let the other boy try the pony, and they became nds. But the same evening he had to tell the incident to father; after the nose had been washed and properly ed, it had taken on alarming proportions, which called an explanation; this Per Hansa got as he sat on the dpile, smoking his evening pipe, with Store-Hans standnear by.

ll the new settlers that spring, with the exception of kel Tallaksen, built sod houses; but he had vaster plans mind. He set up a tent, hitched his four horses to the king plow, worked like a beaver, and soon had broken a field, considering the fact that he had just arrived He brought seed enough with him to plant the whole area.
mours began to spread in the settlement about his plans;
n he was done seeding he proposed to go to Worthington
r lumber; both his living house and barn were to be built summer. . . . Per Hansa listened to these rumours and ked his head on one side, but made no comment.

One day just as they were sitting down to the noon m at Per Hansa's, Torkel Tallaksen swaggered in and asked a loud voice if he could hire Per Hansa and the oxen to go Worthington with him for building materials? All the oth neighbours were going, too. . . . "You folks have been h so long now, and have got such a good start that you c afford to lend a hand to a poor devil who is just starting i I need all the critters that can crawl, with me. I'll pay y in either work or cash—but I prefer cash, for then it's ov with! . . . No, thank you, I'm not going to sit down; I ju stepped in on my way to your neighbours'. . . . Fine fiel you've got on this side of the creek. You ought to get fairly decent harvest, considering. . . . How big is that fi of yours, anyway? . . . Good Lord! Not more than that a whole year? . . . Well, I'll give you a tip—oxen are any good; they're too slow for the way things go nowada . . . Fine-looking house you've got, inside, but sod hous aren't much better than dugouts—in some ways, really n so good. . . . For my part, I am through with such po makeshifts. . . . Well, can I count on you, then?" . Tallaksen referred to this trip as airily as if he were aski for a match.

"Are you going to build?" Per Hansa asked, quietly.

"You bet I am. Isn't that what I've been telling you? I'm to stay here, I intend to live like a human being!" . And now he began outlining his building plans and explai ing them at length. . . . "Oh yes, there's a lot to do before get everything ready; but I intend to hire plenty of help a get it done in a jiffy. See? I've come out here to bre prairie, I want you to know. . . . If crops turn out decent this year, I'll snap up one more quarter by fall, or perha two. Really"—here the man grew confidential—"I don't s any nameable reason why a smart man couldn't farm a who section of land like this—or even more. Why, you've on got to put the plow into the level prairie! . . . But first all, I want to build a decent house; the painting I'll let until fall." . . . His voice flowed on in such a steady strea that no one else could get in a word edgewise.

"You're going to paint?" Per Hansa asked, and got up m the table abruptly. He was breathing fast.

"Paint? Why, certainly! It would never do to let a house nd unpainted in this climate. It wouldn't look well, ner."

A look of innocent curiosity rested on Beret's face as she ened to the great plans being unfolded before her. She med lost in thought, and asked in a quiet tone if it were lly true that he intended to build a home like that—now, nce, this summer? It would be a fine thing, she added—l there was a note of wistful gladness in her voice—to see real house once more. It would make the desert look ghter. . . .

At that Torkel Tallaksen had to laugh outright; he had er seen such a houseful of moles! Here he had been exining till he was hoarse, but apparently they hadn't underod one word of it! What was the use of wasting more ath on them? . . . He turned to go.

"Well," he said to Per Hansa in an important voice, "can ount on you for the trip?"

Per Hansa paused over his answer. They were all look- at him inquiringly when he spoke:

"It seems to me," he began, quietly, "that you are starting m the wrong end." Again he paused, for he found it hard choose his words. "If you would take the money that you end to spend in building and put it into cattle and horses l machinery, and hire help enough to run them, then the vil himself couldn't keep up with you. In a few years u'd be the king of all of us—though God knows we'd much ther have another. But this I tell you, now"—prophetic wer rang in Per Hansa's voice—"if you start from the ner end and do as you've been proposing, then you and I ll fight—yes, you and I!—for both the scepter and the wn . . . though all I've got now, God knows, is a pair of nts and a yoke of oxen!" . . .

Torkel Tallaksen laughed overbearingly. "One doesn't ed to live in a gopher hole, in order to get ahead! . . . ere, too, will have to come decency and civilized living."

The words stung Per Hansa like a whip lash; in his effo to control himself he felt in his pocket for a match, foun one, and hurled it to the floor. . . . "We'll get our decenc and civilized living all right—even if you should go bac where you came from! . . . And now let me tell you or thing more—it's better to begin in a gopher hole than to en in one." . . .

Before Torkel Tallaksen was able to collect himself for reply, Beret said, slowly, as if thinking aloud, but in a manne that compelled attention:

"Your wife certainly will have many reasons to be glac Walls that will shut out all the unspeakable things out her . . . floors that can be washed on the Sabbath eve. . . . know too well that human beings should not live like beasts After they have turned into beasts, houses don't matter." . .

Torkel Tallaksen looked at the woman as if he had dis covered her for the first time. . . . Uh-huh, he nodded here's the common sense of this outfit! . . . "Right you are and no doubt about it! I wouldn't live like this for all th prairie land in the whole of Dakota Territory. . . . But nov things are going to be different, if I have anything to sa about it. We're going to build houses that can stand up an be seen; people won't need to wonder whether this is a settle ment or a gopher camp!" Suddenly a fresh idea seemed t strike him: "Perhaps you'd like to help my wife weave a fev carpets? She's all the time talking about carpets, and I sup pose she must have 'em. . . . They save the floors, too."

"I would be glad to try," said Beret, humbly. "One ough to help another get what she cannot have for herself. . . . think it would be interesting work."

As he listened to his wife, Per Hansa was fumbling in hi pocket for another match; at last he brought it out, struck i on the table, and held it until it burned down to the end. Th room was swimming before his eyes; words floated across hi vision—words that he longed to use; he reached out fo them, but they melted into the air; what Beret had said ha driven them away. . . . Per Hansa sat down heavily on th chest, his face pale and drawn.

"All right—that's settled, then!" said Torkel Tallaksen. en he turned to Per Hansa: "We start the day after to- rrow. I'm counting on you, remember—you and the oxen. . You'll be needing some one to haul for you pretty soon, en you once get on your feet."

Silence fell on the room. The man stood there, waiting an answer.

"You'd better count over again!" Per Hansa growled. thout another word he sprang up from the chest and left house. In a gruff voice he called to the oxen. That day kept on breaking as long as he could see. When he un- hed at last he walked in slowly from the field, stooping r in thought; he could hardly bring himself to going me. What business had he there—what earthly business? . The sod house and all it contained lay in a great dark- s, yet he was drawn toward it irresistibly. . . .

. . Perhaps it was true? What she had said might be re than half right—everything here was a failure, and he nself was no good. . . . A thought cut him to the very ck: "That's the reward you get for fighting and striving— s says you are no good!" . . . To think that she hadn't t ashamed, that she had been willing to lay bare her ubles to that infernal blabberer and braggart! . . . Had e lost all sense of propriety? . . . "Oh, hell! Get up, re!" he ripped out to the oxen.

But as it transpired, Torkel Tallaksen's great plans ran up ainst a snag. Tönseten didn't care to go along unless Per nsa went, for he was fully occupied with his own affairs. d the Solum boys were not overly enthusiastic; they were sy breaking prairie when Tallaksen came, and answered n that they would see how the others felt about it, and let n know. It finally developed that Torkel Tallaksen could gage only two men and two teams, which weren't enough haul home all the materials for a whole farmstead. And in the face of the inevitable, Torkel Tallaksen had to give building for that summer. . . . Thus it happened that ore the fall set in, another sod hut stuck its head above the ving grass of the prairie.

V

That summer many land seekers passed through the settlement on their way west. The arrival of a caravan was always an event of the greatest importance. How exciting they were, those little ships of the Great Plain! The prairie schooners, rigged with canvas tops which gleamed whitely in the shimmering light, first became visible as tiny specks against the eastern sky; one might almost imagine them to be sea gulls perched far, far away on an endless green meadow; but as one continued to watch, the white dots grew; they came drifting across the prairie like the day; after long waiting, they gradually floated out of the haze, distinct and clear; then, as they drew near, they proved to be veritable wagons with horses hitched ahead, with folk and all their possessions inside, and a whole herd of cattle following behind.

The caravan would crawl slowly into the settlement and come to anchor in front of one of the sod houses; the moment it halted, people would swarm down and stretch themselves and begin to look after the teams; cattle would bellow; sheep would bleat as they ran about. Many queer races and costumes were to be seen in these caravans, and a babble of strange tongues shattered the air. Nut-brown youngsters dressed only in a shirt and a pair of pants, would fly around between the huts, looking for other youngsters; an infant in its mother crooning softly to it, would sit securely perched in the fold of her arm; white-haired old men and women who should have been living quietly at home, preparing for a different journey, were also to be seen in the group, running about like youngsters; the daily jogging from sky line to sky line had brightened their eyes and quickened their tongues. All were busy; each had a thousand questions to ask; every last one of them was in high spirits, though they knew no other home than the wagon and the blue skies above . . . The Lord only could tell whence all these people had come and whither they were going! . . .

The caravan usually intended to stop only long enough for the women folk to boil coffee and get a fresh supply of water the starting was always delayed, for the men had so many estions to ask. Once in a while during these halts a fiddler uld bring out his fiddle and play a tune or two, and then re would be dancing. Such instances were rare, but good eer and excitement invariably accompanied these visits.

—Why not settle right here? The Spring Creek folk uld ask the west-movers. . . . There's plenty of good land —nothing better to be found between here and the Pacific ean!

—No, not yet. They weren't quite ready to settle; these rts looked fairly crowded. . . . The farther west, the bet- . . . . They guessed they would have to go on a way, ugh this really looked pretty good! . . .

And so the caravans would roll onward into the green still- ss of the west. How strange—they vanished faster than y had appeared! The white sails grew smaller and smaller the glow of the afternoon, until they had dwindled to hing; the eye might seek them out there in the waning , and search till it grew blurred, but all in vain—they were ne, and had left no trace! . . .

Foggy weather had now been hanging over the prairie for ee whole days; a warm mist of rain mizzled continuously t of the low sky. Toward evening of the third day, the g lifted and clear sky again appeared; the setting sun burst ough the cloud banks rolling up above the western horizon, d transformed them into marvellous fairy castles. . . . hile this was going on, over to the northeast of the Solum ys' place a lonely wagon had crept into sight; it had almost ached the creek before anyone had noticed it, for the Solum ys were visiting among the Sognings, where there were ny young people. But as Beret sat out in the yard, milk- g, the wagon crossed her view. When she brought in the lk, she remarked in her quiet manner that they were going have company, at which tidings the rest of the family had run out and see who might be coming at this time of day. There was only one wagon, with two cows following be- nd; on the left side walked a brown-whiskered, stooping man—he was doing the driving; close behind him came a half-grown boy, dragging his feet heavily. The wagon at last crawled up the hill and came to a stop in Per Hansa's yard, where the whole family stood waiting.

"I don't suppose there are any Norwegians in this settlement? No, that would be too much to expect," said the man in a husky, worn-out voice.

"If you're looking for Norwegians, you have found the right place, all right! We sift the people as they pass through here—keep our own, and let the others go!" . . . Per Hansa wanted to run on, for he felt in high spirits; but he checked himself, observing that the man looked as if he stood on the very brink of the grave.

—Was there any chance of putting up here for the night?

"Certainly! certainly!" cried Per Hansa, briskly, "provided they were willing to take things as they were."

The man didn't answer, but walked instead to the wagon and spoke to some one inside:

"Kari, now you must brace up and come down. Here we have found Norwegians at last!" As if fearing a contradiction, he added: "Ya, they are real Norwegians. I've talked with them."

On top of his words there came out of the wagon, first a puny boy with a hungry face, somewhat smaller than the other boy; then a girl of about the same size, but looking much older. She helped to get down another boy, about six years old, who evidently had been sleeping and looked cross and tired. That seemed to be all.

The man stepped closer to the wagon. "Aren't you coming, Kari?"

A groan sounded within the canvas. The girl grabbed hold of her father's arm. "You must untie the rope! Can't you remember anything?" she whispered, angrily.

"Ya, that's right! Wait a minute till I come and help you."

An irresistible curiosity took hold of Per Hansa; in two jumps he stood on the tongue of the wagon. The sight that met his eyes sent chills running down his spine. Inside sat oman on a pile of clothes, with her back against a large nigrant chest; around her wrists and leading to the handles he chest a strong rope was tied; her face was drawn and atural. Per Hansa trembled so violently that he had to h hold of the wagon box, but inwardly he was swearing eady stream. To him it looked as if the woman was ified.

. . "For God's sake, man!" . . .

he stranger paid no attention; he was pottering about pleading: "Come down now, Kari. . . . Ya, all right, help you! Everything's going to be all right—I know it ! . . . Can you manage to get up?" He had untied the e, and the woman had risen to her knees.

O God!" she sighed, putting her hands to her head.

Please come. That's right; I'll help you!" pleaded the n, as if he were trying to persuade a child.

She came down unsteadily. "Is this the place, Jakob?"
asked in a bewildered way. But now Beret ran up and her arm around her; the women looked into each other's s and instantly a bond of understanding had been estab-
ed. "You come with me!" urged Beret. . . . "O God!
is isn't the place, either!" wailed the woman; but she fol-ed Beret submissively into the house.

Well, well!" sighed the man as he began to unhitch the
ses. "Life isn't easy—no, it certainly isn't." . . .

Per Hansa watched him anxiously, hardly knowing what do. Both the boys kept close to him. Then an idea shed through his mind: "You boys run over to Hans sa's and tell him not to go to bed until I come. . . . No, don't want him here. And you two stay over there to-
ht. Now run along!"

Turning to the man, he asked, "Aren't there any more in ur party?"

'No, not now. We were five, you see, to begin with—five all—but the others had to go on. . . . Haven't they been by e yet? Well, they must be somewhere over to the west-rd. . . . No, life isn't easy." . . . The man wandered on in his monotonous, blurred tone; he sounded all the time as if he were half sobbing.

"Where do you come from?" Per Hansa demanded gruffly.

The man didn't give a direct answer, but continued to ramble on in the same mournful way, stretching his story out interminably. . . . They had been wandering over the prairie for nearly six weeks. . . . Ya, it was a hard life. When they had started from Houston County, Minnesota, there had been five wagons in all. Strange that the others hadn't turned up here. Where could they be? It seemed to him as if he had travelled far enough to reach the ends of the earth! . . . Good God, what a nightmare life was! If he had only—only known. . . . !

"Did the others go away and leave you?" Per Hansa hadn't intended to ask that question, but it had slipped out before he realized what he was saying. He wondered if there could be anything seriously wrong. . . .

"They couldn't possibly wait for us—couldn't have been expected to. Everything went wrong, you see, and I didn't know when I would be able to start again. . . . Turn the horses loose, John," he said to the boy. "Take the pail and see if you can squeeze some milk out of the cows. Poor beasts, they don't give much now!" Then he turned to Per Hansa again: "I don't know what would have become of us if we hadn't reached this place to-night! We'd have been in a bad hole, that I assure you! Women folk can bear up. . . ." The man stopped and blew his nose.

Per Hansa dreaded what might be coming next. "You must have got off your course, since you are coming down from the north?"

The man shook his head helplessly. "To tell the truth, I don't know where we've been these last few days. We couldn't see the sun."

"Haven't you got a compass?"

"Compass? No! I tried to steer with a rope, but the one I had wasn't long enough."

Like hell you did!" exclaimed Per Hansa, excitedly, full a sudden new interest.
"Ya, I tried that rope idea—hitched it to the back of the gon, and let it drag in the wet grass. But it didn't work—I ldn't steer straight with it. The rope was so short, and t kinking around so much, that it didn't leave any wake."
"Uh-huh!" nodded Per Hansa wisely. "You must be a faring man, to have tried that trick!"
"No, I'm no sailor. But fisher-folk out here have told me t it's possible to steer by a rope. . . . I had to try some- ng."
"Where did you cross the Sioux?"
"How do I know where I crossed it? We came to a er a long way to the east of here—that must have been Sioux. We hunted and hunted before we could find a e shallow enough to cross. . . . God! this has certainly n a wandering in the desert for me! . . . But if Kari y gets better, I won't complain—though I never dreamed t life could be so hard." . . .
"Is she—is she sick, that woman of yours?"
The man did not answer this question immediately; he ed his face with the sleeve of his shirt. When he spoke in, his voice had grown even more blurred and indistinct:
ysically she seems to be as well as ever—as far as I can
. She certainly hasn't overworked since we've been velling. I hope there's nothing wrong with her. . . . But tain things are hard to bear—I suppose it's worse for the ther, too—though the Lord knows it hasn't been easy for . either! . . . You see, we had to leave our youngest boy there on the prairie. . . ."
"Leave him?" . . . These were the only two words that ne to Per Hansa's mind.
"Ya, there he lies, our little boy! . . . I never saw a more mising man—you know what I mean—when he grew
. . . But now—oh, well. . . ."
Per Hansa felt faint in the pit of his stomach; his throat w dry; his voice became as husky as that of the other;
came close up to him. "Tell me—how did this happen?"

The man shook his head again, in a sort of dumb despair. Then he cleared his throat and continued with great effort. "I can't tell how it happened! Fate just willed it so. Such things are not to be explained. . . . The boy had been ailing for some time—we knew that, but didn't pay much attention. We had other things to think of. . . . Then he began to fail fast. We were only one day's journey this side of Jackson, so we went back. That was the time when the others left us. I don't blame them much—it was uncertain when we could go on. . . . The doctor we found wasn't a capable man—I realize it now. He spoke only English and couldn't understand what I was saying. He had no idea what was wrong with the boy—I could see that plainly enough. . . . Ya, well—so we started again. . . . It isn't any use to fight against Fate; that's an old saying, and a true one, too, I guess. . . . Before long we saw that the boy wasn't going to recover. So we hurried on, day and night, trying to catch our neighbours. . . . Well, that's about all of it. One night he was gone—just as if you had blown out a candle. Ya, let me see—that was five nights ago."

"Have you got him there in the wagon?" demanded Per Hansa, grabbing the man by the arm.

"No, no," he muttered, huskily. "We buried him out there by a big stone—no coffin or anything. But Kari took the best skirt she had and wrapped it all around him—we had to do something, you know. . . . But," he continued, suddenly straightening up, "Paul cannot lie there! As soon as I find my neighbours, I'll go and get him. Otherwise Kari . . ." The man paused between the sobs that threatened to choke him. "I have had to tie her up the last few days. She insisted on getting out and going back to Paul. I don't think she has had a wink of sleep for over a week. . . . It's just as I was saying—some people can't stand things." . . .

Per Hansa leaned heavily against the wagon. "Has she gone crazy?" he asked, hoarsely.

"She isn't much worse than the rest of us. I don't believe

.. Kari is really a well-balanced woman . . . but you can agine how it feels, to leave a child that way . . ."
The boy, John, had finished milking. He had put the pail vn and was standing a little way off, listening to his her's story; suddenly he threw himself on the ground, bing as if in convulsions.
"John! John!" admonished the father. "Aren't you amed of yourself—a grown-up man like you! Take the k and carry it into the house!"
"That's right!" echoed Per Hansa, pulling himself toher. "We'd better all go in. There's shelter here, and nty to eat."
Beret was bustling around the room when they entered;
had put the woman to bed, and now was tending her.
Where are the boys?" she asked.
Per Hansa told her that he had sent them to Hans Olsa's
the night.
"That was hardly necessary; we could have made room
e somehow." Beret's voice carried a note of keen re-oach.
The man had paused at the door; now he came over to the d, took the limp hand, and muttered: "Poor soul! . . .
hy, I believe she's asleep already!"
Beret came up and pushed him gently aside. "Be care-
! Don't wake her. She needs the rest."
"Ya, I don't doubt it—not I! She hasn't slept for a week, u see—the poor soul!" With a loud sniff, he turned and t the room.
When supper time came the woman seemed to be engulfed a stupefying sleep. Beret did not join the others at the per table, but busied herself, instead, by trying to make e woman more comfortable; she loosened her clothes, took her shoes, and washed her face in warm water; during this the stranger never stirred. That done, Beret began fix up sleeping quarters for the strangers, in the barn.
e carried in fresh hay and brought out all the bedding she d; she herself would take care of the woman, in case she oke and needed attention. Beret did little talking, but she went about these arrangements with a firmness and confidence that surprised her husband.

Per Hansa came in from the barn, after helping the strangers settle themselves for the night. Beret was sitting on the edge of the bed, dressing the baby for the night; she had put And-Ongen to bed beside the distracted woman.

"Did she tell you much?" he asked in a low voice.

Beret glanced toward the other bed before she answered.

"Only that she had had to leave one of her children on the way. She wasn't able to talk connectedly."

"It's a terrible thing!" he said, looking away from his wife. "I think I'll go over to Hans Olsa's for a minute. I want to talk this matter over with him."

"Talk it over with him?" she repeated, coldly. "I don't suppose Hans Olsa knows everything!"

"No, of course not. But these people have got to be helped, and we can't do it all alone." He hesitated for a minute, as if waiting for her consent. "Well, I won't be gone long," he said as he went out of the door.

When he returned, an hour later, she was still sitting on the edge of the bed, with the baby asleep on her lap. They sat in silence for a long while; at last he began to undress. She waited until he was in bed, then turned the lamp low and lay down herself, but without undressing. . . . The lamp shed only a faint light. It was so quiet in the room that one could hear the breathing of all the others. Beret lay there listening; though the room was still, it seemed alive to her with strange movements; she forced herself to open her eyes and look around. Noticing that Per Hansa wasn't asleep either, she asked:

"Did you look after the boys?"

"Nothing the matter with them! They were fast asleep in Sofie's bed."

"You told them everything, at Hans Olsa's?"

"Of course!"

"What did they think of it?"

Per Hansa raised himself on his elbows and glanced at the broken creature lying in the bed back of theirs. The man, apparently, had not stirred a muscle. "It's a bad iness," he said. "We must try to get together a coffin find the boy. We can't let him lie out there—that way." .. As Beret made no answer, he briefly narrated the story the man had told him. "The fellow is a good-for-hing, stupid fool, I'm sure of that," concluded Per Hansa. She listened to him in silence. For some time she brooded r her thoughts; then in a bitter tone she suddenly burst : "Now you can see that this kind of a life is impossible! beyond human endurance."

He had not the power to read her thoughts; he did not nt to know them; to-night every nerve in his body was with apprehension and dismay. But he tried to say, re-uringly: "Hans Olsa and I will both go with the man, as n as the day breaks. If we only had something to make coffin of! The few pieces of board that I've got here will dly be enough. . . . Now let's go to sleep. Be sure and me if you need anything!"

He turned over resolutely, as if determined to sleep; but noticed that he was a long time doing it. . . . I wonder at's going through his mind? she thought. She was glad ave him awake, just the same; to-night there were strange gs abroad in the room. . . . .

VI

The instant the woman had climbed down from the wagon looked into Beret's face a curtain seemed to be drawn r all the terrible experiences of the last few weeks. She ered a cozy room where things were as they should be; felt the warm presence of folk who had dwelt here a g time. She took in the whole room at a glance—table benches and stools; a fire was burning in a real stove; ettle was boiling; wet clothes were hanging on a line by stove, giving out a pleasant, familiar odor; and there ually stood two beds, made up with clean bedding! The se of home, of people who lived in an orderly fashion, pt over her like a warm bath. A kind hand led her to one of the beds, and there she sank down. She mumbled a few words, but soon gave it up; everything about her seeme so wonderfully pleasant; she must keep quiet, so as not t disturb the dream. The hand that helped her had such a sympathetic touch; it took a rag, dipped it in lukewarm wate and wiped her face; then it loosened her clothes and eve took off her shoes. But best of all, she could stretch he back again!

. . . Strange that she couldn't remember what had bee going on! Had she told the woman all that she ought t know? About the makeshift coffin, and the big stone besid which they would find him? And that she would have t take a blanket with her, for the nights were chilly and Pat had very little on—only a shirt that was worn and thin . . . No, she couldn't remember anything except that sh had been able to lie down and stretch her back; the warmt of the room, and the knowledge that friendly people wer near her, had overcome all her senses with a sweet languo Her body lay as if fast asleep; but away back in the inne depths of her consciousness a wee eye peeped out, half oper and saw things. . . .

She remained in the same position until three o'clock i the morning. But then the wee bit of an eye opened wide and her senses slowly began to revive; she realized that sh was lying in a strange room, where a lamp burned with a di light. Suddenly she remembered that she had arrived her last night—but Paul was not with her. . . . Too bad I a so forgetful! she thought. I must hurry now before Jake sees me, because there's no way of stopping him—he alway wants to go on! . . . She was fully awake now; she sat u and buttoned her clothes, then slipped quietly out of bed.

For a moment she stood perfectly still, listening; she cou hear the breathing of many people; bending suddenly ov the bed, she snatched up And-Ongen. She held the chi tenderly in her arms and put her cheek against the war face. . . . We must be careful now! she thought. Wi quiet movements she wrapped her skirt about the sleepin child; glancing around the room to see if all was well, sh led out like a shadow; she did not dare to close the or behind her, lest it should make a noise. . . . "Here our wagon!" she murmured. "I mustn't let Jakob see now; he doesn't understand; he only wants to get on!" .. Clutching the child to her breast, she started on the ., taking a direction away from the house.

Beret was awakened by a voice calling to her from a great cance; it called loudly several times. What a shame they 't let me alone in peace, to get a little rest! she thought, wsily. I was up so late last night and I need the sleep lly! . . . But the voice kept calling so persistently that er a while she sat up in bed, her mind coming back to lity; she remembered that strangers had arrived last night, t another besides herself was in deep distress. Well, she done her best to take care of her. . . . She turned her d to see how the other woman was resting.

. . "Heaven have mercy!" . . .

Beret leaped frantically out of bed; in a second she had ched the side of the other bed, but no one was there. She not notice that And-Ongen was gone, too. A cold draught hing through the room told her that the door stood open; hurried over to it. She seemed to recall dimly that some had recently gone out. Hadn't she heard it in her sleep? ret went through the door and stood in front of the house, did not dare to make an outcry; she listened intently, then ed in a low voice; getting no answer, she ran around the se, peering hither and thither, but the grey morning light closed nothing.

Running back into the house, she called her husband distedly: "She's gone! Get up! You must hurry!"

n an instant Per Hansa was up and had tumbled into his hes. "Run over to Hans Olsa's and tell him to come at e! Be as quick as you can! In the meanwhile I'll search n by the creek."

When they came out, the first light of day was creeping up eastern sky; a slight fog floated along the creek; the ning air was crisp and cool. Per Hansa leaped up into the seat of the wagon and scanned the prairie in every direc tion. . . . What was that, over there? Wasn't it a huma being standing on the top of the hill? Could she have take that direction? . . . He jumped down from the wagon, an rushed around to the other side of the house, called to Bere and pointed up the hill. Instantly they both started out o the run.

The woman did not seem in the least surprised at the coming. When Per Hansa had almost reached her, h stopped stone dead. What, in God's name, was she carryin in her arms? His face blanched with terror. "Come here! he shouted. In a moment he had the child in his own arm

And-Ongen was almost awake now and had begun t whimper; things were going on around her that she coul not understand; she felt cold, and father had such a quee look on his face. Sleepily she cuddled up in the fold of h left arm, her cheek against his heart, though a hard han which seemed to be pounding against a wall was trying t wake her up again; she would just let it go on pounding a it pleased. She had to sleep some more! . . . But no mother was here. Hurriedly she was transferred into h mother's arms and squeezed almost to a pancake. She ha to gasp for breath; nevertheless she snuggled into her arm as closely as she could, for she felt, oh, so sleepy! . . . B no peace here, either! Here, too, a hand pounded against wall. Were they tearing down the house? And-Ongen w certainly at a loss to understand all this racket in the midd of the night. . . . But let 'em pound!

As Beret walked homeward, carrying the child, it seeme more precious to her than the very first time when she ha held it in her arms; and she experienced a wonderful bles ing. Upon this night the Lord had been with them: H mighty arm had shielded them from a fearful calamity.

The other woman was still obsessed by her own trouble she kept on hunting up there on the hill. . . . Wouldn't the people help her to find Paul? She had to find him at once He would be cold with so little on. . . . Now they had tak that blessed child away from her; but she didn't wonder-

: man had a bad face. She felt afraid of him. . . . But time to think of such things now; Jakob would soon be ning? She began muttering to herself: "Oh, why can't nd the stone? What has become of it? Wasn't it some- re here?" . . .

Per Hansa went up and spoke to her, his voice sounding rse and unnatural. "Come with me, now! To-day Hans a and I are going to find your boy." Taking her gently the arm, he led her back to the house. . . . It's very kind nim, to help find Paul, she thought, and followed will- y.

At breakfast she sat very quiet; she ate when they bade . but never spoke. While they were making the coffin sat looking on, wondering why they didn't hurry faster n the work. Couldn't they understand that Paul was l? A little later a handsome woman entered the house—a man with such a kind face, who lined the coffin inside n a white cloth. . . . Now, that is fine of her; that's just t a woman with such a kind face would do! . . . She uld have liked to talk to that woman; she had something y important to confide to her; but perhaps she had better delay her in her work—the coffin had to be lined! . . .

As soon as the coffin was ready, Per Hansa and Hans a, along with the stranger and his wife, left the settlement nunt for the body of the dead boy. They took quite a ck of provisions with them. On this search they were e four days; they criss-crossed the prairie for a long to the east, and searched high and low; but when they urned the coffin was still empty.

VII

After the return from the search the strangers stayed more day with them. The morning they were to leave ooked dark and threatening, and Per Hansa wouldn't hear their setting out; but along toward noon the sky cleared l the weather appeared more settled. The man, very cious to be on his way, had everything loaded into the wagon, and as soon as the noon meal was over they wer ready to go.

But before the man got on his way Per Hansa asked hi where he intended to settle.

—Well, he wasn't positive as to the exact place. It wa over somewhere toward the James River—his neighbou had told him that.

—Did he know where the James River was? Per Hans inquired further.

—Certainly he did! How could he ask such a foolish ques tion? The river lay off there; all he needed to do was t steer straight west. After finding the river, of course he' have to ask. But that part of it would be quite easy. . . .

Per Hansa shuddered, and asked no more questions.

The woman had been quite calm since their return. Sh kept away from the others, muttering to herself and pot tering over insignificant things, much like a child at play but she was docile and inoffensive, and did what anyone tol her. A short while before noon that day she took a notio that she must change her clothes; she got up from what sh was doing, washed, and went to the wagon. When she cam back she had dressed herself in her best; in a way she looke all right, but made a bizarre appearance because she had pu so much on. . . . The man seemed fairly cheerful as the started; he talked a good deal, heaping many blessings upo Per Hansa. . . . If he could only find his neighbours, an Kari could only forget, things would be all right in a littl while. Ya, it was a hard life, but —— Well, God's blessing on Per Hansa, and many thanks! And now he must b off! . . . His voice was just as husky and blurred as whe he came.

The wagon started creaking; the man, short and stooping led the way; the family piled into the wagon; the two cow jogged behind. . . . They laid their course due west. . . Banks of heavy cloud were rolled up on the western horizo —huge, fantastic forms that seemed to await them i Heaven's derision—though they might have been only th last stragglers of the spell of bad weather just past.

After they had gone, Beret could find no peace in the ise; her hand trembled; she felt faint and dizzy; every v and then she had to go out and look at the disappearing gon; and when the hill finally shut off the view she took youngest two children and went up there to watch. In a she felt glad that these people were gone; at the same e she reproached herself for not having urged them to longer. Sitting now on the hilltop, a strong presentiment came over her that they should not have started to-day. "That's the way I've become," she thought sadly. "Here folk in the deepest distress, and I am only glad to send m off into direr calamities! What will they do to-night a storm comes upon them? He is all broken up—he ldn't have been much of a man at any time. And the poor e insane from grief! Perhaps she will disappear forever very night. . . . What misery, what an unspeakable gedy, life is for some!" . . .

Slowly, very slowly, the forlorn caravan crept off into the at, mysterious silence always hovering above the plain. Beret, as she watched, it seemed as if the prairie were llowing up the people, the wagon, the cows and all. At the little caravan was merged in the very infinite itself; et thought she could see the wagon yet, but was not cer-; it might be only a dead tuft of grass far away which wind stirred. . . .

She took the children and went home, walking with slow, gging steps; she wanted to cry, and felt the need of it, no tears came. . . . Per Hansa and the boys were break- prairie; to judge from the language they used in talking he oxen, they must be hard at it. Her loneliness was so at that she felt a physical need of bringing happiness to ne living thing; as soon as she got home she took her little naining store of rice and cooked porridge for supper; the s were very fond of that dish.

Toward evening the air grew heavy and sultry; the cloud ks, still rolling up in the western sky, had taken on a st threatening aspect; it looked as if a thunderstorm might coming on.

After supper Per Hansa was due to meet at Hans Olsa's with the other neighbours, to lay plans for the trip to town which had to be made before harvesting set in. The boy asked leave to go, too—it was so much fun to be with the men.

When she had washed the supper dishes Beret went out doors and sat down on the woodpile. A nameless apprehension tugged at her heart and would not leave her in peace; taking the two children as before, she again ascended the hill. The spell of the afternoon's sadness was still upon her; her constant self-reproach since then had only deepened it. . . . Those poor folk were straying somewhere out there under the towering clouds. Poor souls! The Lord pity the mother who had left a part of herself back east on the prairie! How could the good God permit creatures made in His image to fall into such tribulations? To people this desert would be as impossible as to empty the sea. For how could folk establish homes in an endless wilderness? Was it not the Evil One that had struck them with blindness. . . . Take her own case, for example: here she sat, thousands of miles from home and kindred, lost in a limitless void. . . . Out yonder drifted these folk, like chips on a current. . . . Must man perish because of his own foolishness? Where, then, was the guiding hand? . . . Beret was gazing at the western sky as the twilight fast gathered around her; her eyes were riveted on a certain cloud that had taken on the shape of a face, awful of mien and giantlike in proportions; the face seemed to swell out of the prairie and filled half the heavens.

She gazed a long time; now she could see the monster clearer. The face was unmistakable! There were the outlines of the nose and mouth. The eyes—deep, dark caves in the cloud—were closed. The mouth, if it were to open would be a yawning abyss. The chin rested on the prairie. . . . Black and lean the whole face, but of such gigantic menacing proportions! Wasn't there something like a leer upon it? . . . And the terrible creature was spreading

ywhere; she trembled so desperately that she had tc hold of the grass.

was a strange emotion that Beret was harbouring at this nent; in reality she felt a certain morbid satisfaction—much like a child that has been arguing with its parents, turned out to be right, and, just as the tears are coming,
, "Now, there, you see!" . . . Here was the simple solu-to the whole riddle. She had known in her heart all time that people were never led into such deep affliction ss an evil power had been turned loose among them.
hadn't she clearly felt that there were unspeakable gs out yonder—that the great stillness was nothing but asleep? . . . She sat still as death, feeling the super-ral emanations all around her. The face came closer in dusk—didn't she feel its cold breath upon her? When mouth opened and began to suck, terrible things would en! . . . Without daring to look again, she snatched up children and ran blindly home.

fter a while the others returned, the boys storming erously into the house, the father close behind; he was ently chasing them; by the tone of his voice, she knew as in high spirits.

Why, Beret," he cried gayly, as soon as he got inside,
at have you been doing to the windows—covering them

He was looking at her with narrow, sparkling eyes.
et, Beret, you're a dear girl!" he whispered. Then he over and fondled her—he wanted to help undress her put her to bed. . . .

No, no—not that!" she cried, vehemently, an intense r surging up within her. Had he no sense whatever of ncy and propriety, no feeling of shame and sin? . . .
's only one more proof, she thought, that the devil has his clutches!

fter that time, Beret was conscious of the face whenever was awake, but particularly along toward evening, as wilight came on; then it drew closer to her and seemed

Even during the day she would often be aware of its nce; high noon might stand over the prairie, with the sun shedding a flood of light that fairly blinded the sigh but through and behind the light she would see it—huge ar horrible it was, the eyes always closed, with only tho empty, cavernlike sockets beneath the brows.

As she went about doing her work, now, she would fr quently be seized by a faintness so great that she had to s down. . . . How was this going to end? she asked herse Yes, how would it end? . . . Vague premonitions hover about her like shadows. Many times she was on the point asking her husband if he saw what she did, towering abo the prairie out west; but always she seemed to be tongu tied. . . . Well, why mention it? Couldn't he and the othe see it perfectly well for themselves? How could they he it? . . . She noticed that a silence would often fall upo them when they were out-of-doors, especially in the evenin Certainly they saw it! . . . Every evening, now, wheth Per Hansa was away or at home, she hung something ov the windows—it helped shut out the fear. . . .

At first her husband made all sorts of fun of this practi of hers; he teased her about it, as if it were a good joke, ar continued to force his caresses on her, his voice low ar vibrant with pent-up emotion. But as time went on he ceas laughing; the fear that possessed her had begun to affect hi too. . . .

VIII

The month of July wore on. The small patches of fiel in the Spring Creek settlement were slowly ripening ar made a brave showing. Never had one seen finer field The grain had started to head out long ago; the kernels we already formed, tiny bodies wrapped in the most delica green silk. With every day that passed the wheat filled o more and more; the heads grew heavy and full of milk; soon as the breeze died down in the afternoon, they wou tilt toward the setting sun and slowly drop off to sleep, on to dream of the marvellous life that was now stirring with them.

these days, Per Hansa was behaving like a good boat in eavy sea—as long as the keel pointed the right way, he ld go on. He watched his wife covering the windows ight, and felt both sad and angry; but when he saw how ything was growing on the farm—meadows and fields, le and youngsters—then he was filled with an exultant that made him momentarily forget his wife's condition.
had a larger field than any of his neighbours, and there n't a doubt that his grain was the finest—theirs was just nary dumb grain, while his seemed alive! . . . He tried eason himself out of his serious misgivings over Beret.
e enough, she didn't act as a normal person should; yet
as nothing that wouldn't naturally right itself with time.
haps he would go to work and build her a house this fall.
thunder, he'd have to see about that! The castle would e to be tackled sooner or later. . . . The lumberman at rthington was a fine fellow, and Per Hansa wouldn't be med to ask him for credit. Huh! What could the man ect to do with his lumber but sell it? . . . Next spring would make a big haul in his fur trade with the Indians;
I buy every damned scalp they had in the place. And n his castle was ready it would be stranger than the il if such a sensible girl as Beret didn't perk up and w off her gruesome fancies!

Everything he had planted that spring was blooming like a len. Why, he could just hear the potatoes grow! Ally, as early as this, they were having new potatoes y day, while in his neighbours' patches the plants were beginning to blossom. The oats, too, were standing ; but the wheat—best of all was the wheat! The neighrs, and all the east-siders—so the folk who had settled of the creek had come to be called—and even the Irish n over to the westward, would come to look at his wheat l and say that the sight did them good. He couldn't erstand what the Irish were saying, of course, but their at the sight of the wheat was written all over their faces.
Damned fine people, these Irish. Too bad he couldn't with them. But he felt like showing his appreciation of their visits in some tangible way, so he would go over to th potato patch, dig into a row, and give them enough for meal. . . . Good God! a man as well off as he was mu lend a hand to a pack of starving devils! . . .

By this time Tönseten had lost the last vestige of ill-feelin toward Per Hansa for doing his own seeding; he was eve willing to praise the other for having had sense enough t get the seed into the ground good and early. Now the would be able to cut and harvest the wheat here before th other fields had ripened. . . . "I tell you what, Per Hansa that's the most sensible thing you ever did in your life—an I ought to know what I'm talking about!" . . . Tönseten round, fat body bristled with importance, for, of course, would fall to him to do the reaping for these greenhorn The Solum boys would have to teach them how to bin Damn it, he couldn't be expected to do everything! . . . Ye Syvert Tönseten was a very busy man these days. Ther was the reaper to overhaul, and the harnesses to be mended he had to keep a sharp eye on the grain, too, lest they let stand too long. Such heavy wheat would shell easily! S he waddled back and forth between the houses of his thre neighbours, invariably finding some important matter to dis cuss wherever he went.

Per Hansa was not running true to form these days; h who was always so easily excited and never had patience t wait when something had to be done, seemed in no hurry t start his harvesting. Every evening he would make a tri up to the field, to see how the wheat was coming on, an with each trip his mind was more at ease. "Come up wit me and see how fine the wheat stands!" he would coax Bere And Beret would usually go; she would agree absen mindedly that the grain looked fine—of course it did; b then she would always remember some task she had left u done at home and would have to hurry back before dar she seldom seemed to have time to wait for him.

. . . "No, no, there's no hurry yet with the wheat!" P Hansa thought. When Tönseten insisted that it was time start cutting he would argue with him: "No, Syvert brothe ll leave the wheat awhile yet—give her a spell longer to k it over. You'll be able to do the reaping easily enough ore the others need you. Don't we all know that your ul in running the reaper isn't to be found in the whole Dakota Territory?"

önseten would give an embarrassed cough: "You mean aps in Minnesota?"

Certainly! Wasn't that what I said?" Whereupon both ld laugh like a couple of happy boys.

ut one forenoon Tönseten came over in great excite-nt, declaring flatly that now they would have to start ing here—and no use talking! He had just come from ns Olsa's, where he'd been looking at the field; and there, the grain was ripening fast. This job had to be gotten of the way right now, or where the devil would they be?

Oh, what's your hurry, Syvert? Don't let's get excited;
ll just give her one more night for extra measure!"
ued Per Hansa.

Then Tönseten grew goggle-eyed, waving his arms as he
ed. "You're a stubborn, ignorant fool, Per Hansa—I 't mind telling you so! No, I'm damned if I do! Here have eighty acres of grain, and I alone must do all the ting! In all probability I'll have to help the east-siders,
; they don't seem to have any more brains than they d—some of 'em don't, at least!"

Take it easy, take it easy, Syvert! Don't you see how ly the wheat is filling out—just like a young girl budding o womanhood?"

At that Tönseten got mad in earnest. "You make me d, man! You don't know as much as the nose on your e—no, you don't! What the devil would happen to us ll our grain came in at the same time? Just what would do, I'd like to know? We couldn't save it. . . . Now
e made up my mind: there's to be no more damned shillyllying. We start this afternoon, and that's the end of

"As you say, Captain!" answered Per Hansa, meekly, his s twinkling.

"All right, then. I'll tell Hans Olsa. You run over at tell the Solum boys."

Per Hansa chuckled aloud. "Are you going to call in a of Dakota Territory to help harvest this little patch mine?"

"Stop your joking, Per Hansa! You don't know a earthly thing about harvesting in America—no, you don' You and Hans Olsa couldn't any more take care of th binding, when I once get going, than you could fly! Yo don't even know what needs to be done; you've never see a job of binding in your life! . . . Now do as I tell you an get the Solum boys!" . . . Tönseten spoke as if the welfa of the whole country were resting on his shoulders. H neighbour only laughed still harder and did as he was bid.

The moment the noon meal was over, the whole of th little settlement assembled at Per Hansa's wheat field, me women, and children; Beret had brought And-Ongen wi her, and even carried the baby in her arms. Tönseten shouts and numberless commands put everyone but himse in a festive mood; he felt it to be a solemn occasion, an highly disapproved of the way they took it; but the othe only laughed and joked as gayly as if they were in a brid procession on the way to church, some bright Sunday morn ing. Some one would think of a funny remark, whic straightway would cause some one else to make a still funni sally; though most of it was aimed at Tönseten, his wi laughed until the tears came. But Tönseten held himse superior to their silly talk; he had matters of weight an purpose on his mind. Fools will snicker and blat! he o served to himself, working steadily on; that's the only wa one can keep 'em going. He was on his back under th machine, sweating streams, hammering away with a heav monkey wrench, tightening one bur here and another ther now here was a place that needed oiling. . . . "What th devil became of the oil can? Can't you do anything but stan there and grin? Come here and help me!"

But at last he got things so far along that he could hit horses to the reaper; taking the lines, he mounted to the ne.

. . . "Now, the Lord help us!" he muttered to himself. He ted to give more orders, but couldn't get a chance; the quitoes were bad and the horses rather uneasy, and new gs kept happening all the time. With a great flourish he œuvred the reaper over to the edge of the field, shouted lly to the horses—and the first harvest in the settlement Spring Creek had begun.

he machine roared fearfully as it got its belly full of the y grain, but kept calling for more; the horses stepped at a lively pace and gave it what it called for. Tönseten now intent on cutting out the first swathe; it had to be ight, and yet it couldn't leave anything along the edge; was too much taken up with this momentous task even to the others. But when he had finished the fourth round he field he felt that he was master of the situation. Stop-g the machine, he called in English to Henry Solum—how he getting along? Could he pound any sense into those ts? Well, Kjersti had been a smart binder in her day.
y didn't he get her to help him with the instruction? . . .
l then, turning majestically in his seat, he addressed Per nsa:

If this wheat doesn't run forty bushels to the acre, I'll eat own shirt! By God, I will! . . . Well, anyway, thirty-
. . ."

You go on with the cutting, brother!" chuckled Per
nsa. "Here's a whole army waiting for something to . . . Go on, I say. We'll measure it up later."

All were working; all were having a good time. For the enhorns the binding proved to be more like work than ; they soon caught on to the trick; there were so many them at it that the binding this afternoon went like a y game. When Beret finally put the baby down on the ss and began tying up bundles of wheat Kjersti felt that had to come over and speak to her. There wasn't any d of that, she said; the men could easily handle what to be done. Heavens and earth—five grown men and two boys in a field no bigger than this! Beret and Söri had better go home and get a lunch ready, Kjersti advis further; the menfolk were never happier than when th had coffee brought to them in the field. She knew them

. . . After a while the two women followed her advice ar went home to make their preparations.

Per Hansa was in a rare mood that afternoon. Now h was binding his own wheat, his hands oily with the sap
the new-cut stems; a fine oil it was, too—he rubbed his hand together and felt a sensuous pleasure welling up within hi
His body seemed to grow a little with every bundle he tie he walked as if on springs; a strength the like of which h had never felt before ran through his muscles. How goo it was to be alive! He had made a daring throw, and luc had smiled on him! . . . He tied the ripe, heavy bundle gave them a twist, and there stood the shock! As he looke at them he laughed to himself joyously, stopping a secon as he finished each one to draw his hands over his face. . .
He must handle these bundles with care—the heavy kerne might shell out. . . . How absurdly light-hearted and ga he felt to-day! . . .

The men continued working until the dew became so heav
on the wheat that the reaping machine refused to go; it wa long after sundown before they quit. Tönseten felt sti and tired, but he wasn't announcing the fact from the hous tops. In Per Hansa's hut stood a table heaped with man good things, though the porridge bowls predominated. Bot Kjersti and Sörine had been home to do their own chor for the night, and had returned to help Beret with the suppe

The men were already seated at the table; but they waite for Per Hansa, who had his head in the big chest and wa hunting for something or other. "Hold on a minute, boy before you say grace," came from the cavernous depths o
the chest. "Haven't you manners enough to wait for th head of the family?" . . . When he finally emerged an came up to the table, he shook a bottle behind Tönseten's ea asking, gayly, "Did you ever hear a sweeter sound, Syvert Can't you just hear her wink at you, my boy?" . . . Ther enough in the bottle for one round, and then a little o to swallow on, before the meal started.

önseten cleared his throat after the drink; he was anxious nake a little speech:
What do you plan on doing in the future, Per Hansa, if re going to get rich on the very first crop? . . . I never my life saw such wheat! Why, the kernels are like toes!"
How about yourself, then?" inquired Per Hansa in great H humour. "I like to help worthy people who are in ble; in case you and Kjersti should run short of stock-
; to keep your money in, you might come to me!"
s the meal went on, the spirits of the men sitting abou table rose higher and higher, and each vied with the other ood cheer.
Rich?" exclaimed Tönseten. "We'll all get rich; no
bt about it! . . . It's going to be hardest on Sam, poor ow. He'll have to spend it all in getting married to that Trönder girl who's waiting for him over east by the x River! Hard luck, I say!"
Yes, sir!" drawled Sam, blushing furiously. "But if I e you, Kjersti, I wouldn't let Syvert go to the wedding—
I wouldn't at all!"
Why?" laughed Kjersti, innocently.
Well, you see, he gets sort of strung-up when he's turned se among the Trönder women—not that I mean anything, know. . . ."
Sam, you're a fool!" remarked Tönseten, angrily, laying vn his spoon and leaving the table.

IX

By noon the next day they had finished the wheat field.
-day Tönseten was of a different mind—there really was great hurry; the weather kept cool, and the grain didn't k any riper to-day than yesterday, either at his own place at Hans Olsa's; if this spell of cool weather should last, wheat would profit by yet another week; but then they might prepare to harvest a crop unique in the history wheat growing.

Tönseten felt highly well pleased with himself and the re of the world; he had now proved his prowess before h neighbours; the field was almost finished here, and it would do any harm to rest and visit awhile. . . . "Don't fret, boy I won't need to hurry at all! Those four acres of oats w only be play for the afternoon!"

And Per Hansa felt very much the same way. He a the other men were sitting in the shade on the north side the house, with their backs up against the wall, enjoyi the cool breeze that had sprung up from the west. . What was the use of hurrying? . . . Per Hansa had told t Solum boys that he wouldn't need them that afternoon, he and Hans Olsa could easily bind the oats; but it was pleasant to rest here and spin yarns that the boys didn feel like stirring until the others went to the field.

As they got up at last and returned to their work, t northwest breeze struck them full in the face with its co fresh fragrance; Tönseten sniffed it approvingly, declari that if this weather kept on, he and Hans Olsa would be su to steal a march on Per Hansa in the end; never had t Lord sent finer weather for wheat to ripen in! He chuckl and talked away, his rotund body bobbing up and down wi an irresistible merriment. . . . "Well, boys, in my opini the Land of Canaan didn't have much on this country—n I'm damned if it had! Do you suppose the children of Isra ever smelt a westerly breeze like this? Why, folks, i blowing honey!" . . . His festive mood was still possessi him as he began to hitch up the horses; in the midst of it had to turn around and ask them shyly, "Now, wasn't remarkable that I should discover just this place for you

Hans Olsa burst into a laugh. "Yes, it surely was wo derful, Syvert!"

But Tönseten felt that this praise wasn't enough— wanted to carry the joke a little farther. Turning to other neighbour, he asked with the same roguish air, "Wh did you say, Per Hansa?"

er Hansa remained strangely silent; he was standing a distance away, shading his eyes with his right hand and ing into the west; an intent, troubled expression had e over his face.

. . "What in the devil? . . ." he muttered to himself. in the western sky he had caught sight of something he dn't understand—something that sent a nameless chill ugh his blood. . . . Could that be a storm coming on?

e hurried over to the wheat shock where Hans Olsa was ng, pointed westward, and asked in a low voice, "Tell can you see anything over there?"

ans Olsa was on his feet in an instant. . . . "Well, look nat! . . . It must be going to storm!"

önseten had finished hitching the horses to the reaper, had just mounted the seat when he saw Per Hansa run , pointing to the west. Now both his neighbours were nting at him:

"What's that, Syvert?"

önseten turned in his seat, to face a sight such as he had er seen or heard before. From out of the west layers of ds came rolling—thin layers that rose and sank on the eze; they had none of the look or manner of ordinary ds; they came in waves, like the surges of the sea, and a glittering sheen before them as they came; they seemed e made of some solid murky substance that threw out ll sparks along its face.

The three men stood spellbound, watching the oncoming or; their voices died in their throats; their minds were nk. The horses snorted as they, too, caught sight of it, became very restless.

The ominous waves of cloud seemed to advance with ific speed, breaking now and then like a huge surf, and h the deep, dull roaring sound as of a heavy undertow ing into caverns in a mountain side. . . . But they were ther breakers nor foam, these waves. . . . It seemed more f the unseen hand of a giant were shaking an immense ecloth of iridescent colours! . . .

For God's sake, what——!" . . . Tönseten didn't finish; unconsciously he had been hauling so hard on the lines tha the horses began backing the machine.

Just then Ole and Store-Hans came running wildly up shouting breathlessly, "A snowstorm is coming! . . . See! . . . The next moment the first wave of the weird clou engulfed them, spewing over them its hideous, unearthl contents. The horses became uncontrollable. "Come her and give me some help!" cried Tönseten through the eeri hail, but the others, standing like statues, heard nothing an paid no heed; the impact of the solid surge had forced ther to turn their backs to the wind. Tönseten could not hold th horses; they bolted across the field, cutting a wide semi circle through the oats; not until he had the stern of hi craft well into the wind could he stop them long enough t scramble down and unhitch them from the reaper.

At that moment two women came running up—Kjerst first, with her skirt thrown over her head, Sörine a little wa behind, beating the air with frantic motions. The Solun boys, too, had now joined the terror-stricken little crowd Down by the creek the grazing cows had hoisted their tail straight in the air and run for the nearest shelter; and n sooner had the horses been turned loose, than they followe suit; man and beast alike were overcome by a nameless fea

And now from out the sky gushed down with cruel force living, pulsating stream, striking the backs of the helples folk like pebbles thrown by an unseen hand; but that whic fell out of the heavens was not pebbles, nor raindrops, no hail, for then it would have lain inanimate where it fell this substance had no sooner fallen than it popped up again crackling, and snapping—rose up and disappeared in th twinkling of an eye; it flared and flittered around them lik light gone mad; it chirped and buzzed through the air; snapped and hopped along the ground; the whole place wa a weltering turmoil of raging little demons; if one looke for a moment into the wind, one saw nothing but glitterin lightninglike flashes—flashes that came and went, in th heart of a cloud made up of innumerable dark-brown clickin bodies! All the while the roaring sound continued.

Father!" shrieked Store-Hans through the storm. ey're little birds—they have regular wings! Look here!" . The boy had caught one in his hand; spreading the gs and holding it out by their tips, he showed it to his ner. The body of the unearthly creature had a dark- wn colour; it was about an inch in length, or perhaps a e longer; it was plump around the middle and tapered oth ends; on either side of its head sparkled a tiny black that seemed to look out with a supernatural intelligence; erneath it were long, slender legs with rusty bands around n; the wings were transparent and of a pale, light colour. For God's sake, child, throw it away!" moaned Kjersti. he boy dropped it in fright. No sooner had he let it go n there sounded a snap, a twinkling flash was seen, and creature had merged itself with the countless legions of ering devils which now filled all space. They whizzed in the air; they literally covered the ground; they lit on heads of grain, on the stubble, on everything in sight— ping and glittering, millions on millions of them. . . . people watched it, stricken with fear and awe. Here Another One speaking! . . .

Kjersti was crying bitterly; Sörine's kind face was deathly as she glanced at the men, trying to bolster up her rage; but the big frame of her husband was bent in ht and dismay. He spoke slowly and solemnly: "This st be one of the plagues mentioned in the Bible!"

"Yes! and the devil take it!" muttered Per Hansa, darkly. . "But it can't last forever."

To Tönseten the words of Per Hansa, in an hour like this, nded like the sheerest blasphemy; they would surely call wn upon them a still darker wrath! He turned to reprove neighbour: "Now the Lord is taking back what he has en," he said, impressively. "I might have guessed that I uld never be permitted to harvest such wheat. That was ing too much!"

"Stop your silly gabble!" snarled Per Hansa. "Do you lly suppose He needs to take the bread out of your uth?"

There was a certain consolation in Per Hansa's outburs of angry rationalism; Kjersti ceased weeping, though it wa her own husband that had been put to shame. "I believe Pe Hansa is right," she said, the sobs still choking her. "Th Lord can't have any use for our wheat. He doesn't nee bread, anyway. He certainly wouldn't take it from us i this way!"

But her open unbelief only confirmed her husband in hi position; clearing his throat, he began to take Kjersti to task "Don't you remember your catechism, and your Bible his tory? Isn't it plainly stated that this is one of the seve plagues that fell upon Egypt? Look out for your tongu woman, lest He send us the other six, too! . . . It states a plain as day that it was because the people hardened them selves!" . . .

Tönseten would probably have gone on indefinitely ex pounding the Scriptures to his wife if Henry Solum hadn interrupted just then with a practical idea. Turning to hi brother, he said, "Go fetch the horses, so we can finish thi field; by to-morrow there won't be anything left!"

Per Hansa looked at Henry and nodded approvingly; th simple practicability of the suggestion had touched the chor of action again; he jumped to his feet and walked across t the field, where the work of devastation was already in fu progress. As he saw the fine, ripe grain being ruthlessl destroyed before his eyes, he felt but one impulse—to sto the inroads of these demons in any possible way. He bega to jump up and down and wave his hat, stamping and yellin like one possessed. But the hosts of horrid creatures frolick ing about him never so much as noticed his presence; th brown bodies whizzed by on every hand, alighting whereve they pleased, chirping wherever they went; as many as hal a dozen of them would perch on a single head of grain, whil the stem would be covered with them all the way to th ground; even his own body seemed to be a desirable haltin place; they lit on his arms, his back, his neck—they eve dared to light on his bared head and on the very hat h waved.

His utter impotence in the face of this tragedy threw him an uncontrollable fury; he lost all restraint over himself. ou, Ola!" he shouted, hoarsely. "Run home after Old ria, and bring the caps!"

The boy was soon back with the old musket. His father, dly able to wait, ran to meet him and snatched the weapon of his hands. Hurriedly putting on a cap, he settled him- in a firm foothold—for he still had sense enough to ember how hard the rifle kicked when it had been lying led a long time.

As Hans Olsa caught wind of what he intended to do he d to stop it. "Don't do that, Per Hansa! If the Lord sent this affliction on us, then . . ."

Per Hansa glowered at him with a look of angry determina- ; then, facing squarely the hurricane of flying bodies, he d straight into the thickest of the welter! . . . The awful onation of the old, rusty muzzle-loader had a singular ect; at first, as the shattering sound died away, nothing eared to have happened—the glittering demons flickered as unconcernedly as before; but presently a new move- nt seemed to originate within the body of the main cloud; egan to heave and roll with a lifting motion; in a few utes the cloud had left the ground and was sailing over ir heads, with only an intermittent hail of bodies pelting vn on them out of its lower fringe; the roaring becoming re muffled.

"Do you suppose you've actually driven them off?" cried nry, breathlessly, marvelling as he watched.

"Yes, from here!" said Hans Olsa in the same solemn tone, ne pointed down the hill. "But see our fields . . . !"

Per Hansa was still in the grip of the strange spell that taken possession of him; he apparently did not hear what others were saying; without looking again he hurried to help Sam with the horses. "Let's get the reaper ted!" he cried. "No sense in sitting here like a row of mmies!"

His example roused them once more, and without further rds they followed his lead; just before sundown that night they finished the oat field at Per Hansa's. All th while fresh clouds of marauders were passing over. As soo as he could get away each man hurried to his own place they were all terribly anxious to see how much damage ha been done at home. . . . Couldn't they start cutting to morrow, even if the grain wasn't quite ripe? they thought a they hurried on. Wouldn't it be possible to save somethin out of the wreck? What in God's name could they do if th whole crop were destroyed? . . . Anxiety tugged at the heartstrings. Yes, what could they do? . . .

Ole and Store-Hans went home with Hans Olsa to brin back word as to whether it would be possible to start harves ing his field in the morning. Per Hansa walked home alone the spell had lifted now, and the reaction had left him in troubled, irresolute frame of mind. The things that had hap pened that afternoon seemed harsh and inexplicable. . . To be sure, he had saved his whole crop—but how and why He had saved it—partly because of his own foolish, head strong acts, and partly because his land chanced to lie s much higher than that of his neighbours, that it had bee the first to dry out in the spring. . . . Well, great luck fo him! But at this moment gladness and happiness were th last things that he could feel. . . . There were his neigh bours—poor devils! Hadn't they worked just as faithfully hadn't they struggled just as hard—and with a great dea more common sense than he had shown? Why should the have to suffer this terrible calamity while he went scot-free . . . And there was something else that worried him des perately. Throughout the afternoon, while he had bee working, vague misgivings of how it was going at home ha visited him, an uneasy sense of oppression and impendin disaster; he had found himself constantly watching his ow house, and had every moment expected to see Beret com around the corner. But not a soul had he caught sight of i all this time, moving about down there, though the har labour and the fiends of the air had left him scant chance t think about it till now.

As he approached the house his misgivings grew more pro

nced, till suddenly they leaped into an overmastering fear h he tried to assuage by telling himself that she had kept ors because she had not dared to leave the children, and in doing so she had acted wisely. . . . The house lay in twilight as he drew near; there was no sign of life to een or heard, except the malign beings that still snapped flared through the air; the sod hut, surrounded as it was lowing shapes, looked like a quay thrust out into a turnt current; in the deepening twilight, the pale, shiming sails of the flying creatures had taken on a still more arthly sheen; they came, flickered by, and were gone in nstant, only to give place to myriads more.

. . . Can she have gone over to one of the neighbours'?
wondered as he came up to the door. No, she hasn't—the can't be closed from the outside. . . . Per Hansa gasped breath as he knocked on the door of his own house. . . .
rapped harder . . . called, with his voice tearing from throat:

Open the door, Beret!"

He found himself listening intently, his ears strained to h the least sound; at length he thought he heard a move-t inside, and a great wave of relief swept over him.

. . "Thank God!" . . . He waited for the door to be ned—but nothing happened; nothing more could be heard.
. What can she be doing? Didn't she hear me? What in aven's name has she put in front of the door? . . .

Per Hansa had begun to shove against the panel.

Open the door, I tell you! . . . Beret—where are
?" . . .

Once more he listened; once more he caught a faint sound;
the blood pounding in his ears deafened him now. Pull-himself together, he shoved against the door with all his ngth—shoved until red streaks were flashing before his
s. The door began to give—the opening widened; at he had pushed it wide enough to slip through.

. . "Beret!" . . . The anguish of his cry cut through air. . . . "Beret!" . . .

Now he stood in the middle of the room. It was absolutely dark before his eyes; he looked wildly around, but could se nothing.

. . . "Beret, where are you?" . . .

No answer came—there was no one to be seen. Bu wasn't that a sound? "Beret!" he called again, sharply. H heard it now distinctly. Was it coming from one of th beds, or over there by the door? . . . It was a faint, whim pering sound. He rushed to the beds and threw off the bed clothes—no one in this one, no one in that one—it must b over by the door! . . . He staggered back—the big chest wa standing in front of the door. Who could have dragged there? . . . Per Hansa flung the cover open with franti haste. The sight that met his eyes made his blood run cold Down in the depths of the great chest lay Beret, huddled u and holding the baby in her arms; And-Ongen was crouch ing at her feet—the whimpering sound had come from her.

It seemed for a moment as if he would go mad; the roor swam and receded in dizzy circles. . . . But things had to b done. First he lifted And-Ongen out and carried her to th bed—then the baby. At last he took Beret up in his arms slammed down the lid of the chest, and set her on it.

. . . "Beret, Beret!" . . . he kept whispering.

All his strength seemed to leave him as he looked into he tear-swollen face; yet it wasn't her tears that drained hi heart dry—the face was that of a stranger, behind whic her own face seemed to be hidden.

He gazed at her helplessly, imploringly; she returned th gaze in a fixed stare, and whispered hoarsely:

"Hasn't the devil got you yet? He has been all aroun here to-day. . . . Put the chest back in front of the doo right away! He doesn't dare to take the chest, you see. . . We must hide in it—all of us!"

"Oh, Beret!" begged Per Hansa, his very soul in the cry Speechless and all undone, he sank down before her, threw his arms around her waist, and buried his head in her lap— as if he were a child needing comfort.

The action touched her; she began to pat his head, runnin her fingers through his hair and stroking his cheek. . .

hat's right!" she crooned. . . . "Weep now, weep much l long because of your sin! . . . So I have done every ht—not that it helps much. . . . Out here nobody pays ention to our tears . . . it's too open and wild . . . but loes no harm to try."

"Oh, Beret, my own girl!"

"Yes, yes, I know," she said, as if to hush him. She grew re loving, caressed him tenderly, bent over to lift him to her . . . "Don't be afraid, dear boy of mine! . . . For . well . . . it's always worst just before it's over!"

Per Hansa gazed deep into her eyes; a sound of agony me from his throat; he sank down suddenly in a heap
l knew nothing more. . . .

Outside, the fiendish shapes flickered and danced in the ng glow of the day. The breeze had died down; the air med unaccountably lighter.

. . That night the Great Prairie stretched herself volupusly; giantlike and full of cunning, she laughed softly o the reddish moon. "Now we will see what human ght may avail against us! . . . Now we'll see!" . . .

X

And now had begun a seemingly endless struggle between n's fortitude in adversity, on the one hand, and the pow-of evil in high places, on the other. There were signs the scourge in the summer of '73, but not before the lowing year did it assume the proportions of a plague;
er that it raged with unabated fury throughout the years
, '75, '76, '77, and part of '78; then it disappeared as sudly and mysteriously as it had come. The devastation it ought was terrible; it made beggars of some, and drove ers insane; still others it sent wandering back to the est lands, though they found conditions little better there, ner. . . . But the greater number simply hung on where y were. They stayed because poverty, that most supreme masters, had deprived them of the liberty to rise up and go away. And where would they have gone? In the nam of Heaven, whither would they have fled?

In the course of time it came about that fresh inroads o settlers, just as poverty-stricken as they were, arrived t help them suffer privation and to wait for better time . . . Beautiful out here on the wide prairie—yes, beautifu indeed! . . . The finest soil you ever dreamed of—a veri table Land of Canaan! . . . One caravan after anothe came creaking along, a single wagon dropping out to settl here, another to settle there; for it really looked wonderfu this vast expanse of level, smiling plain—the new Promise Land into which the Lord was leading His poor people fro all the corners of the earth! . . .

But the plague of locusts proved as certain as the season All that grew above the ground, with the exception of th wild grass, it would pounce upon and destroy; the grass i left untouched because it had grown here ere time was an without the aid of man's hand. . . .

Who would dare affirm that this plague was not of super natural origin? During the spring season, and throughou the early part of the summer, the air would be as pure an clear as if it had been filtered, wrapping and caressing th body like the finest silk; the sky would be as blue as if it ha been scoured and newly painted; everything planted in th ground by man would grow as if by magic, filling out wit an amazing fruitfulness, as the long warm days passed i endless array, until it bent under its own burden. An then, just as the process of ripening had begun, or perhap a little before, the plague would descend upon them, sud denly, mysteriously, disastrously! On a certain bright sunny day, when the breeze sighed its loveliest out of th northwest, strange clouds would appear in the western sky swiftly they would advance, floating lazily through the clea air, a sight beautiful to behold. But these clouds would b made up of innumerable dark-brown bodies with slende legs, sailing on transparent wings; in an instant the air woul be filled with nameless, unclean creatures—legions o legions of them, hosts without number! Now pity the field the hand of man had planted with so much care! And ruthless marauders invariably came out of the clear thwest where the afternoon glow was brightest, most rvellous; more than often toward evening, when the day sinking to rest and all earth seemed at peace, they would ae. To these wandering Norsemen, the old adage that evil dwells below and springs from the north, was proving e again.[1]

During the summer of their first visitation, the demons behind them evil enough to pollute a whole continent. the plowed fields they laid tiny, frail eggs, having the earance of fine dry sawdust; although they seemed so cate, these eggs would lie there unharmed during the fall season, and all through the winter, embedded in ice covered by many feet of snow, thawing and freezing by ns in the early spring; but when the hot sun of summer warmed them for a while they would suddenly burst n, letting loose a host of voracious, crawling devils. This nomenon called to mind another saying: No evil is te so bad as that which man himself fosters. It seemed be true enough in this case; for these little wriggling nons were not only revoltingly nasty to look at, but they caused an even greater devastation than those which ne flying on the wings of the western breeze.

Not that these others ceased coming now, because man l raised a crop of his own—God, no! It would happen days at a time, during the height of the pest season, that could not see clear sky. But not always did the scourge ose to descend; often the locust clouds would come drift- across the sun, very much like streamers of snow, float- lazily by for days on end; then, all of a sudden, as if rcome by their own neglect, they would swoop down, hing and spreading out like an angry flood, slicing and shearing, cutting with greedy teeth, laying waste every foot of the field they lighted in. At last, perhaps by the time the next afternoon's breeze had risen, they would apparently take the notion that this wasn't a fit place to stay in; in a moment they would fly up and be gone in a great cloud, off on the search for new conquests.

[1] An old superstition that goes back to Norse mythology: the gdom of Darkness and Evil was located in the far north; the way Hell led downward and in a northerly direction. In the practice sorcery and witchcraft, whenever water was to be used it must ays be taken from streams flowing from south to north, for such er had supernatural power.

Impossible to outguess them! No creatures ever acted so whimsically or showed such a lack of rational, orderly method. One field they might entirely lay waste, while they ate only a few rods into the next; a third, lying close beside the others, they might not choose to touch at all. In one field they would cut the stalks, leaving the ground strewn with a green carpet of heads; in the next they might content themselves with shearing the beard—then the grain looked like shorn sheep with the ears gone. Nor were they at all fastidious: potatoes and vegetables of all kinds, barley and oats, wheat and rye—it made no difference; or a swarm of insects might light on a wagon box, and when it lifted again the box would have been scarred by countless sharp teeth; at one place a fork with a handle of hickory might be standing in the ground, and after a few swarms had passed the surface of the handle would be rasped and chewed, a mass of loose slivers; somewhere else a garment might be laid out on the ground to dry—a swarm would light on it, and in a moment only shreds would be left; if the annihilating devils were in the proper mood, they would take anything and leave nothing.

The folk looked on helplessly, in grim despair and awe-stricken wonder; the more timid ones among them were oppressed by a growing fear, while the godless swore so that the air smelled of brimstone; the pious would assemble in homes and churches, entreating the Lord to deliver them from famine and pestilence; but the brave did not lose heart and kept on busily inventing all sorts of devices with which to drive the demons away. Many odd expedients were tried in different places; simple-minded people would take a washtub and a rolling pin, and beat until they were tired never a ripple did such a din cause in the current's steady 7.

nd all the while the folk tried to comfort one another.
. It will be better by-and-by, you know! . . . This gue must leave some time—it can't go on forever! . . .
e Sognings were a people of even temperament, not easily ttered; they bore the affliction with remarkable calmness fortitude. Of course this thing would have to stop!
ey had faith to believe it—how could it well be otherwise?
.. And their cousins, the Vossings, would always agree h them. Yes, indeed! Why, such things always seem dest to bear at the first—don't we know that? . . . Some would think of a hallowed consolation with which to nfort the others. Wasn't it pretty bad in Egypt?—But at did the Book say? Didn't the plague vanish there?
ny, it had lasted practically no time at all! . . . I'll bet last dollar, some one else would venture, that next year erything will be all right! . . . And when it turned out be just as bad the following year, the same person would even more confident. Now, see—we've had this thing
h us two years already—this is the end! Who ever heard a plague lasting forever? Don't you remember the Black ath? That finished up in half a year, didn't it, and was ver heard of again? . . . And even when the third sum-r came, and there was no let-up in the awful visitation, ne bright head would remember the indisputable fact that good things are three. So there!—Now let's thank the rd that we're through with it at last! Just wait awhile—soil out here is first class; if we hang on, we're sure make a clean sweep! . . . On the fourth summer the gue raged worse than ever before; but now it had begun lose its power over the people—they feared it no longer.
e're getting used to it, they would say with a bitter laugh.
takes neither man nor beast—let's thank God for that,
way! . . .

III. The Glory of the Lord

I

A DAY in June, of quivering, vital sunlight. . . . The irregular shadows of fleecy clouds drifting across an endless plain. . . . Sun and irregular, fleecy clouds—nothing but these all day . . .

Over the prairie, making toward the settlement by Spring Creek, rattled an old, dilapidated cart, antique of build, in a state so wretched that it seemed ready to fall apart at the next tussock it might encounter.

The nag in front was in perfect keeping with the vehicle. long-shanked and rawboned, and so lean and lanky that one could have counted every rib. Originally its colour might have been a light grey, but now it was no longer definable: dirty grey, rusty, yellowish-brown—it might have been any one of these, or just as accurately something else. Only a few miserable hanks were left of what probably had once been a flowing mane. Above the shoulders rose a big hump when the animal stretched out its neck, one was reminded of a dromedary. Undoubtedly it had once been an authentic horse, but that must have been a long time ago.

The man in the seat was of even more uncertain age than either horse or vehicle. He might be forty-five, or he might just as likely be sixty-five. But for his beard and stoutness one would be inclined to guess the former figure, for the expression of his face was still youthful, the eyes bright and sparkling with something boyish in their gleam. But the beard clearly suggested a more advanced age; it stretched from ear to ear, forming a thick fringe around the chin it was perhaps an inch long, heavy and stiff, originally blond in color, but now streaked with grey. The clothes, too ified to the man's advanced age; especially the coat, which ned to be neither coat nor jacket, but something out of ordinary—a garment of thin black cloth, loosely fitting, long to be called a jacket, yet not long enough for a top-t.

he horse trudged slowly on, the cart jolting and rumbling ind; the man on the seat allowed him to dawdle as much e pleased, and hummed tunes to himself to pass the time.
er a long while the sod huts by Spring Creek began ost imperceptibly to lift their heads out of the ground;
not a bit too soon, for evening was fast coming on.

A couple of frame houses, one large and square, the other aller and with a high gable, had long been visible. They med strangely conspicuous in the bare, level landscape;
could not help wondering if they really belonged here he wilderness. The man on the cart, however, apparently d no heed to them; as the sod huts came more and more hin the range of his vision, his humming gradually grew nter and more intermittent.

'Hm . . . hm. . . . Well, here they are. Move along w, King!" came coaxingly from out of the fringe of rd. "We must try to scratch gravel, you see, and get re before the folks go to bed. Go 'long, I tell you, go ng!"

The sun had already set when the horse came to a stand-l in front of one of the huts; the traveller did not get wn.

'Anybody at home here?" he shouted in a strong voice.

Sounds of sudden movement were heard within. A stout l-worn, red-faced man came hastily out, an equally stout rounder woman rolled after him, both with their mouths l of food; the red-faced man was wiping his beard; both and his wife were staring at the stranger.

'I asked if there were people here," repeated the man, consciously falling into the idiom of his native tongue and ng a phrase that carried a special meaning. Behind the nge of his whiskers beamed a broad smile.

"Oh, the devil! Are you Norwegian, then?" shouted the red-faced man, jovially.

"So, so! Do you call on that fellow around here?"

The man on the ground immediately grew serious; he and his wife were staring at the stranger.

"Have you any more food than you need for supper, and a place to put up a tired horse that's been on his feet all day?"

Without waiting for an answer, the speaker threw down the lines, stepped out of the cart, stretched himself, and sighed with relief.

"My, my! How stiff one gets from all this shaking! . . . What's your name, my good man?"

"My name is Syvert Tönseten. What kind of a fellow may you be?" Tönseten came close up and looked inquiringly at the stranger, who had now turned to the woman:

"Have you got any food in the house, mother?" And ignoring the man, the traveller took from his cart a large, old, and well-worn satchel, which he deposited on the ground.

"Why, yes . . . of course . . . if you will take what we have!" said Kjersti, slowly. There she paused; moving behind her husband, she took her hand from under her apron and gave a pull at his jacket; she had now looked the stranger over and didn't feel altogether relieved. . . .

Tönseten was too preoccupied with himself to notice her. "I am asking you," he said with pompous dignity, "what kind of a fellow you are and what you are after. Are you looking for land?"

The stranger put his hands against his sides, looked straight at them, and said, impressively:

"I am a minister. As for you, my good man, you ought not to stand there swearing into the face of strangers! . . . Now let me ask you again: May I stop here to-night?"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Tönseten, letting his breath go as if some one had hit him in the stomach.

"Oh, my! Oh, my!" wailed Kjersti, awe-stricken, yet overwhelmed with joy. "Is the man crazy? Can he really minister? . . . Of course he must stop here, if he can eat the stuff we have!"

Don't worry about that, mother." He turned to her band. "And now you and I will attend to the horse."

Tönseten's knees were weak from penitent zeal; he trem- with eagerness to help; he wanted to talk, but his voice ed and the words would not come. But the horse was derfully well cared for; he even went back a second e, after they were through, to spread another layer of w for bedding. While they worked the minister had ny questions to ask; they took their own time about ning in.

At last Tönseten ushered the minister into the hut, placed hair at the farthest end of the table, and bade him be ted. The table now was laid with a white tablecloth, on ch had been placed a superabundance of food for only person; there were römmekolle and flatbröd, fresh milk boiled eggs; there were coffee and cakes; but even so, ersti thought it too little to offer such a distinguished tor; now she was busy frying a couple of egg pancakes. ank goodness, there was plenty of what she had! She l hurriedly tidied up the room; it looked cozy and com- table inside the hut, and the minister could not refrain m expressing his admiration.

Finally he sat up to the table and began to eat, praising erything that he tasted and helping himself bountifully, e a healthy person whose hunger has been sharpened by ong fast.

Tönseten remained standing in the middle of the floor, king with the minister; his manner was humble almost to point of unction, his voice had taken on a tone of great emnity. Kjersti hung in the background by the stove, here the room lay in shadow, listening closely to the con- rsation; she was more concerned about what her husband d than to follow the minister's discourse—Syvert was so sily excited, poor fellow, and had so little experience in king to people of quality! She watched the minister as helped himself liberally to the food, and felt the blessing of it descend upon her. How kind of him to say the nic things he did about the food she had prepared! . . . An he chatted with them so pleasantly and naturally! No trace of sermonizing in his talk! Why, he and Syvert were jus discussing ordinary everyday things—about conditions a they were around there, about crops and prospects, abou the best way to run a farm. . . . Now and then Tönsete would turn their conversation toward the future; he wa more interested in visualizing how things were going to turn out than in making a bare statement of how they actually were; that was something he could enlarge upon to the min ister! And the minister seemed to have much good advice thus they ought to do with that, he said, and so with this but differently with the other. . . . At length he inquire about the religious life of the people in this locality. Tön seten cleared his throat at the question, which he had beer expecting, and answered emphatically that that was a subject on which he wasn't very well posted; you couldn't expect a common farmer to know much about such matters. And then he began hurriedly to ask the pastor which way he had come, and whether he had seen many settlers in the parts through which he had travelled. This, in turn, gave him an opportunity to tell how the country looked hereabouts when he had first arrived six years ago; he waxed so eloquent on this point that it seemed difficult for him to stop. . . Kjersti realized that he was now on extremely dangerous ground!——

At last the minister had finished his meal.

"Now then, my good man, be silent, and we will thank the Lord for this day."

"Yes, yes—of course!" . . . Tönseten blew his nose vigorously; but not knowing what to do with himself next he stuck his thumbs inside his trousers-band, and stood where he was in the middle of the floor, utterly unnerved.

Kjersti sank down on the wood-box, and wiped her eyes with her apron. . . . She wanted to tell her husband to sit down, but simply couldn't screw up her courage to do it.

Placing his folded hands on the table, the minister began quiet way, as if addressing some one they could not who stood very near; he seemed to be well acquainted this unseen being, for he spoke in a low voice and very nately, as to a dear friend who, unexpectedly, had done a good turn. He thanked Him for the day that now past, nevermore to return, entreating Him to cast into ocean of grace all sins committed on this day; he prayed and earnestly for the people out here, for the house in h he sat, and especially for the man standing there who so prone to swear; in one way or another He must come im and remind him constantly of what His holy law ided with respect to this grievous sin. But He must be too severe with these poor people, for they had wan- d far from home and some had gone astray, and long they dwelt out here in the Great Wilderness, without epherd and without care. Truly, life had not been easy them! . . . After saying amen, he remained silent for e time, with hands still folded; from the candle on the e a pale glow was thrown over his face, touching the ge of his beard with pure silver. . . . Peace had fallen he room.

hen the minister arose.

Praise be to God, and thanks to you, good people, for sumptuous feast!"

önseten again blew his nose violently; then, overcome n confusion, he wheeled about and walked out of the hut. jersti sat on the wood-box, weeping with mingled emo- s. The minister came over and took her by the hand. fine meal you prepared for me, mother, and here are heartfelt thanks!"

Oh, well—that's nothing!" . . . She shook her head echlessly, but could not let go his hand.

n a moment Tönseten returned. . . . This would never he wanted to explain. He wasn't such a bad case as the nister seemed to think. He ought to hear some of the ers when they let themselves go! . . . But as soon as he od in the presence of the pastor, confusion overcame him again; he merely stuttered and stammered, and found noth ing to say.

The minister now opened his satchel; first of all he too out a large, fat pouch, and then an ancient pipe, which h carefully cleaned and promptly filled. "A little incense, think, will now be blessedly enjoyable. . . . No, just remai seated, mother."

II

The sleeping quarters assigned to the minister were th spare sod house, a structure which was now to be found o every farm. Clothes were hung in it, and food was store there, as well as tools and farm implements; it might eve contain a blacksmith's shop and a carpenter's bench, if th size of the room was sufficient; but nearly always there wa a bed, made and ready for use.

But the minister seemed more anxious to visit with ther than to go to bed; he smoked pipe after pipe, striking against his toe to knock out the ashes, each time filling an lighting it anew. He asked them all about their life, and th struggle they had had since they came to this place. Thi was rich for Tönseten; he never tired of telling. . . . Finall the minister knocked out the ashes of his pipe for the las time, got up, and laid it carefully aside.

"Well, now the day is done, and a fine, blessed day it ha been; the night is approaching, so let us enjoy sweet repos . . . Where do you intend to put me up for the nigh mother?"

Both Kjersti and Tönseten felt that they must accompan him to the other hut. There stood the bed, with a sma table at its side, covered with a rose-coloured cloth; the roo was small and crowded, but seemed cozy and cheerful witha

"Oh, here it will be sweet to stretch one's weary limbs! exclaimed the minister, joyfully.

"What a wonderful man he is!" thought Kjersti. Sh began to make many excuses because they had nothing bette to offer.

With a mixture of jest and earnestness the minister re-ed her for such talk; soon they were all three laughing ther, and it was so pleasant that the hosts could hardly themselves away.

Tönseten had aged considerably in the last two years; one had known him before that time would scarcely recog-him now. He had struggled with a bad cough for two secutive springs; this spring it had been so violent at es that he feared the end had come; but Kjersti had finally naged to boil and dose it out of him. It had left its mark, rever; he became easily tired now, and needed a lot of p in order to keep going.

ut to-night he didn't get much sleep; and what little there brought no rest. Serious things to think about had sud-ly come forward. . . . Oh, my God! . . .

He would have liked to stay with the minister for a private confidential talk; but he knew that Kjersti would never away and leave them alone. While she was clearing the e, after they had gone back to their own house, he slipped and walked over to the other hut; but when he got there realized that it was too late; he couldn't talk to the minister night—it would never do to disturb him now.

At last they went to bed together, Tönseten and his wife. rsti lost consciousness almost at once; but Syvert lay ke a long while, pondering over how he might be able gain the ear of the minister. . . . "To-morrow morning," thought, "before the minister shows up, I'll take some h water over to him. I'll sit down in the doorway while washes, where I can see if anyone is coming; then, maybe, get a chance to talk with him. . . . I'll tell him every-g. There's going to be the devil to pay! Useless to try tricks here—I can't get out of it. His eyes are too keen ney see right through you! . . . But suppose Kjersti es along while we are talking? Well, there you are! He ld be likely to refer to it again when we go over to the se, and that would give the whole thing away; he's a or when he begins asking questions! No, this thing always been my own worry, and it shall continue to be.

. . . O Lord! I dread it like hell! If he could make such fuss over that little innocent word I dropped, just speakin naturally, what will he say about this?" . . . Cold sweat wa standing on Tönseten's forehead. . . . "No, it will probabl be better to wait till he leaves; then I can go along with hir a little way—get out of range of those eyes of hers."

This decision brought him something like peace, but n sleep; for now he had to consider how to present the cas in the best light possible. No sooner had he begun to thin that over than the whole wretched business stood clearl before his eyes; there he lay, wide awake, staring at hi great sin. . . .

Tönseten was indeed in a terrible plight; none but him self knew how utterly heinous and desperate it was. Unti last spring he hadn't known it, either; but at that time, whe he was lying prostrate and the cough was threatening t make an end of him, he had come to a full realization of th enormity of his deed; since then it had hung over him lik a dark shadow, growing deeper and deeper the longer h turned it in his mind. . . . Just imagine a perfectly innocen man getting himself into such a fix! But had anyone, inno cent or guilty, ever committed a sin like the one that lay a his door?

This minister seemed to have a lot of sense, though; per haps he might understand that it wasn't altogether Syvert' fault, in a manner of speaking. . . . They had come to him you see—he couldn't get out of it. He had been legall elected, too; and one of the specified duties of his office wa to do just this thing. Surely those who had laid down th law and forced ignorant people to perform such acts ough to be made to bear part of the blame! . . . Of course, h might have objected. Oh yes, that was just it—he migh have refused. That was probably just what the ministe would say; he felt it in his bones. Great God, what a mess . . . The picture of it passed before his mind in rank an file, clearly and distinctly; he could both see and hear th actors of that hateful drama; and so he lived it over onc e to the last detail, muttering to himself, and turning nately hot and cold.

would be just four years the coming fall since this trans-sion had taken place. . . . It had even happened on a lay afternoon. . . . Well, perhaps that wasn't so bad.
whole crowd had come walking up toward the hut;
ly all the east-siders were in the procession, with nnes Mörstad and his girl, Josie, in the center. . . .
ror Hegg had explained their errand—Halvor, he was etty decent fellow. Tönseten couldn't remember the ex-words now, but their import was something like this:
u are a justice of the peace, Syvert Tönseten, and that is ry important office." He remembered one thing dis-ly, that Halvor had emphasized the word important.
w, Johannes and Josie, they want to get married and live ther, because Johannes, he needs help the way he is ling; and there isn't anyone else but you to perform the mony. According to law and justice, you'll have to do oo, as near as you can in the Christian manner; you ze that yourself." That was the trend of Halvor's re-ks. . . . Tönseten groaned aloud, for he well rememd how frightened he had been when he had finally waked o the grim fact that Halvor meant what he said. Since spring, when he had lain there fighting with death, he scarcely thought of anything else. . . .

nd that Sunday afternoon he had married the couple!
he could only be sure, even, that he had done it prop-according to law! But he had been unable to find the rs and instructions furnished him for such an occasion; hat they would have helped him much, for they were all nglish. . . . The neighbours had elected him justice of peace when they organized the town; the regulations
d for such an official, and they had poked a lot of fun im about his important office. At that time he hadn't med that it would ever call for legal or technical action, of all for anything like that. . . . How could he, an rant layman, have dared to go to work deliberately and uch a sacrilegious thing! Tönseten spat on the floor and rolled over in bed; he was absolutely convinced that heaviest sin one could commit was that of meddling in sac matters.

. . . He had excused himself—he had tried to get out it! He had insisted that he didn't know how—the nei bours could testify to that! . . .

The worst of it was that the young people had made me with him about it, both then and afterward; they had h rahed for the "parson" as well as for the bridal couple, a had applauded the whole ceremony as if it were a joke. .
And Johannes and Josie had moved at once into a ho of their own and had lived together as man and wife e since. . . . What infamy! The minister would simply h to do something about it! . . . Oh yes, he recalled the wh damnable business. . . .

Why, hadn't the two principals themselves, Johannes a Josie, stood before him without a sign of seriousness in th attitude; hadn't they even laughed right into his face? .
And he couldn't be certain that he, too, hadn't smiled, though he had tried hard to keep his face straight. . . . Th he had taken her hand and placed it in Johannes's. . . . N now let's see, it must have been the other way around; it h been Josie, however, who had taken the notion that he was doing it right, and had insisted on changing the hands—others had laughed and shouted fit to kill. . . . With t settled, in a deep silence he had pronounced these wor
"Now, Johannes, you take this woman standing by yo side—yes, I say, take her now, and use her decently a honorably, as is befitting good Norwegian folk!" After t he had uttered the word "amen" in a loud voice—for the l of him he couldn't think of anything else to say. And Jo had looked up brightly into his face, her eyes snapping w mischief—she was such a pretty girl and had laughed so h pily! . . . Since then these two had lived together as m and wife—in infamy! But after all, no serious calamity h befallen them, save that the children had come so terri close together; at any rate, they were all pretty and w shaped! . . . Huf! Huf! . . .

Tönseten turned over for the twentieth time. Oh, well, would confess to the minister in the morning, let the stising be ever so severe. He must be absolved of this ! If that cough should return next winter, there was no ing what might happen! . . .

Since children baptized at home could be rebaptized by a nister, as if the religious ceremony had only been post-ed, there was no logical reason why a matter like this ldn't be mended!

At breakfast next morning the minister kept asking a host questions; he inquired at length about everything that his f survey had shown him: Who lived in this hut and who d in that? Who had built the big houses? How had se men happened to prosper ahead of the others?

Tönseten sat at the opposite end of the table, where he s served separately. This morning he didn't seem to have appetite—he couldn't relish his food. . . . It was onishing how many things the minister found to ask ques-ns about. . . . Throughout the breakfast Tönseten sat in grip of a silent fear, afraid of what might come next; as n as the meal was safely over, he found a pretext for ving the room.

A few moments later the minister came out into the yard, h his satchel in his hand, and glanced around at the ghbourhood where he had arrived. In his wake came ersti, bashfully tripping out of the house; Tönseten walked tlessly about the yard, handling one thing after another, did not approach the minister; then the latter called out him:

. . Who lived directly west of them?

. . Why, that was Hans Olsa—that is to say, Hans Vaag.

. . And to the north?

. . That was Per Holm—or rather Per Hansa, as he was led.

The minister scrutinized closely that part of the settlement ible from where they stood; then he went on with his uiries about the people.

. . Where was the largest house?

. . . Did he mean the biggest room? Well, that was Per Holm's; he had gone ahead and built on a big scale t very spring he came out; people had thought him crazy putting up such a sod house, but it had turned out that wasn't so crazy, after all. . . . Torkel Tallaksen was n building a grand house of lumber, that would surely be mansion when it was finished; but it wasn't done yet. . . .

"Well, now, let's get to work," said the minister, res lutely. "First of all, my good man, I must get you to h me. Will you hurry around to all your neighbours and t them that to-day, at two o'clock, I shall conduct divine ser ices at the house of this man Per Holm. Everyone mu be present—tell them that they have to come! And yo mother"—he turned to address Kjersti—"I think it wou be a kindness of you if you were to go over and help Mr Holm get the house ready for the service; it need not anything extraordinary, but the place in which the Lord blessings are dealt out ought at least to be clean and tidy

They gazed at the minister in alarm, but for a while sa nothing.

"Well—poor Beret!" sighed Kjersti, compassionately.

"Beret? . . . So that is her name? What is the matt with the woman? Are they so very poor?"

Suddenly Tönseten forgot his reserve and spoke emphatically: "I'll tell you about it. This Per Hansa—th is to say, Per Holm—he has got rich out here; he has do better than anyone else, though he came here without a cent his name. And why shouldn't he have done well? He h plenty of help in his own family, so he never needs to hir and besides that, good luck has followed him right alon The first year we settled, for instance, the grasshoppers ca and made a clean sweep of the rest of us; but Per Han saved his whole crop! The same year he made a big ha with his potatoes . . . why, he must have sold for a tho sand that year, and nobody knows how much he has ma these years on the fur trade that he's carried on with t Indians. . . . He is now settled on three quarters of land

"Well, well! that's fine! But what ails his wife?"

Now it was Kjersti's turn; she shook her head sadly as ne related all the distressing circumstances. Now and then önseten, fearing that she hadn't made things clear enough, ould put in a word. The minister prompted them with uestions. After a while he had learned the whole sad story out Beret Holm. . . . His face clouded as he listened; it as as if the sun had suddenly darkened over a beautiful ndscape, until it became drab and desolate to look upon. or a long time he stood there absorbed in thought, the two azing at him apprehensively; they dared not speak to him this mood. At last he said, quietly, "I think we had better rrange it this way, mother: I will go over there first, and ou follow about noontime. As for you, my friend," turng to Tönseten, "try to do your errand well! Remember at they must bring all the children requiring baptism. on't forget that! And tell them to be sure and bring their ymn books, too."

The minister was now making his preparations to go to er Hansa's; as the distance was so short, he had decided to ave his horse.

Tönseten fussed about uneasily, delaying his errand; he ssured the minister that he needn't worry—he would get the essage around to everybody in good season—it would only ake a minute or two! . . . His red beard caught the sunght every time he moved his head, which now kept bobbing round in a ridiculous way.

At last the minister took his departure and Tönseten was n hand to go along with him.

"Let me carry that satchel for you. . . . I'll begin here on ne north side and work east—that's the shortest way."

They walked on side by side, the minister deeply absorbed n thought; after a while Tönseten fell a little way behind.

"I want to talk to you about something," he tried to say asually. His voice was so faint and low that the other could ardly catch it.

The minister stopped short and looked at him. Tönseten lanced this way and that; his eyes fell to the ground and he made nervous dashes here and there, as if seekir escape. . . .

"Well?" . . .

Too late now! . . . Tönseten took a deep breath, sun moned all his courage, glanced once at the minister—the turned his head away. . . .

"I just wanted to ask you if . . . well . . . if it's possib to marry a couple who are already married? Because in th case, I'd ask them to come, too."

"You mean, they are divorced?"

"No, indeed, not divorced! Heavens! I should say no But maybe it wasn't done just right, you see, when th ceremony was performed. . . ."

"I am afraid I do not understand you."

Tönseten spat out a huge mouthful of tobacco juice, an looked up into the sky.

"You see, it happened here," he confessed in a despera voice, "that we had to organize the township; so we ha to have officials, you see. Well, they went ahead and electe me justice of the peace. . . . How could I help it, I'd lik to know? . . . And then, you see, there wasn't a minister t be found in all Dakota Territory—there simply wasn't on in sight!" Tönseten waved his hand with a wild gestur still looking off into the sky.

The minister's face expanded into a broad smile.

"And so you had to serve as minister?"

"You've hit it—that's exactly what happened! . . . Yo see, this fellow, Johannes Mörstad, and his wife, the couldn't wait any longer—they should have been marrie long before, for that matter. And so they pounced upo me! . . . I refused point blank, of course . . . I have wi nesses to that. But then, you see, I really was justice of th peace; and at last I had to give in. . . . That's the worst si of all!" . . . Tönseten could only whisper now.

"And so you married them?" said the minister, slowly.

"Well, yes—I pitched in and did the best I could. . . . Bu now you've got to fix it up properly!" begged Tönseten.

The minister's smile suddenly became a loud chuckle

Tönseten listened incredulously; that chuckle descended on the anxious old fellow like a warm shower; it gave him courage to glance again at his companion. So great was his thankfulness that the feeling surged through him: for that man he could gladly die!

He spat and sputtered, blowing his nose in stentorian tones; but he could not take his eyes off the other man's face.

"Was it long ago?"

"It will be four years this coming fall. . . . It was the third Sunday after Trinity, to be exact. I put a mark in my hymn book."

"You did what the law prescribed?"

"Of course I did! . . . Well, that is to say . . . I'm only an ignorant man . . ."

"Are there any children?"

"Children! Don't talk about it! There are three of them already, with a fourth well on the way. As far as that part of it is concerned," Tönseten observed in all seriousness, "everything seems to have been done properly enough! But . . . well, you'll just have to do it over again!"

"No," said the minister, still smiling, "that is your job, and I'll have nothing to do with it. But tell them to bring the children with them. . . . And now see that you get started!"

"But wasn't it a sacrilegious thing to do?"

"Yes, under normal conditions—undoubtedly. But at the time, as you say, conditions were far from normal out here, and you had been duly elected to perform certain official duties. . . . The Children of Israel wandered about in the desert; at first they used the barren desert for their house of worship, then came the tabernacle, finally the temple. And so with our people in this country. Such marrying practices as some people have here are sacrilegious and must be discontinued . . . you're right in that."

"Do you think the Lord will ever forgive me?"

"That I truly believe He will! This probably is not the worst sin you have committed!" . . .

Tönseten's joy and relief were almost suffocating; he wiped his eyes as he gazed at the minister. . . . What a marvellously sensible man! . . .

"I'll hurry right off and tell them! . . . But, please, I be of you, don't mention this at home. You see—well, Kjersti is not very strong." . . .

And now Tönseten was speeding along in great excitement from farm to farm, announcing to all the people that a pastor had come to them at last and that they must gather to hear him, he was such a wonderfully able man. And the farther and faster he went, the easier became the road and the more wonderful did the minister grow in his mind, a fact which he emphasized at every place he came to and enlarged upon whenever he could stop long enough to draw breath. And he forgot neither the children nor the hymn books; he even found other items to bring to their attention. . . . All the while he was thinking: Just imagine, even he could splice a couple together so that it was all right with the Lord. Well, well, that certainly was a most remarkable thing! . . .

III

The minister stood in the corner next to the window, arrayed in full canonicals. The gown was threadbare and badly wrinkled, as a result of its many journeys inside the old valise; the ruff might have been whiter, perhaps; but such trifles were not noticed now, for here stood a real Norwegian minister in ruff and robe! . . . It was undoubtedly true, what Tönseten had said about him—he was an altogether remarkable man. The vestments which he wore seemed only to emphasize the strength of his features, whose youthful vigour, in spite of the grey-streaked beard, appeared at this solemn moment to have taken on a new glow of life.

The table, spread with a white cloth, had been placed so close to the window that the minister barely had space to stand behind it; on the table stood two homemade candles, one at either end; the candlesticks, too, were homemade, cut from two four-inch pieces of sapling, with the bark left on and painted white; at a little distance they looked like curious works of art. The candles were not yet lighted; a bible and a hymn book lay between them.

The time for the meeting had come. The people filed slowly in and took their places, settling down wherever space was available; on the beds sat women crowded close together, strung along the edge like beads; these were mostly the mothers, and behind them sat and lay the children all over the beds; on the big chest eight in all had taken their seats, running from big to little; the chest had been pulled out from the wall, so that people could sit on all four sides; the six rough benches which Per Hansa and Hans Olsa had hastily nailed together were now filled to capacity, mostly by women, young children, and older people who were not able to stay on their feet so long.

The beds stood in one corner of the room, the stove in another; in the third were the minister and the table; in the fourth, and on every available part of the floor, people were packed like sardines. As many as the room would actually hold had crowded in, eager to see the minister. But not all who had come could gain an entrance; quite a crowd had to remain outdoors: some stood along the walls; others had settled down on the grass. From those outside the house came the subdued sound of talk and laughter.

The women had dressed up in their best for the occasion, and most of the men, as well; but here and there one saw a man who had come straight from his work in the fields, his face covered with sweat and grime. . . .

In the dense cluster of people by the door some one cleared his throat loudly; another was heard to mutter that it was a good thing they didn't have to be particular about the floor! This latter remark caused a slight disturbance in the group; a voice laughed outright, and a couple of men tried to push the people ahead of them forward a little, so that they could clear a space to spit in. . . . The minister glanced up sharply, searching the crowd for the one who had spoken; the youthful look on his face changed to sternness as he rapped on the table:

"Let us have silence, good people! We will begin at once."

He raised his voice: "Those who are outside must keep pe fectly quiet!"

And now a deep silence descended on the closely packe room; through this silence the sound of quiet breathing ro and fell, gently yet perceptibly, like the rise and fall of heavy ocean swell.

The pastor read the opening prayer. Then he announce the hymn which they were to sing, and himself led the sing ing; a few joined in at first, one voice after another strag gling along, like waves on a calm sea; but before the firs stanza was ended every voice had picked up the tune and th room was vibrating to a surge of mighty song. After th hymn the minister chanted, conducting the full service jus as if it had been in a real church. . . . How wonderful i seemed! . . . Before long the men had to slip their coats of it had grown so warm in the room.

The minister preached on the coming of the Israelites int the Land of Canaan. He began by reminding his hearer of the dangers which the Children of Israel had been oblige to pass through, and of the struggles and tribulations whic they had been forced to endure. He set forth what had bee promised them if they would remain faithful to the heritag of their fathers and obedient to the law which the Lord ha given them as their guide.

Then, in powerful strokes, he sketched the history o Israel. First of all, how had the ten tribes fared? They ha been taken as prisoners to a strange country; they had re mained there and had forsaken their gods; and then they ha disappeared, leaving no trace, like the morning dew on th face of the Great Prairie. Where were the ten tribes now Not a word nor a sign remained of them—not even a chanc name, here or there, to indicate where they must have been Was it not significant that a whole people could disappear s completely? . . . How different the story of the two-trib peoples! They, too, had been put in chains and treated a slaves; but they had been held in bonds of loyalty to thei race and to Him who had nurtured them; and they had en dured and prospered. And so, at last, they had come bac

o rebuild the ruined walls of Zion—and from their loins had prung the Saviour of mankind!

Then the minister shifted the scene, applying the parable o those who stood before him; they, too, had wandered in earch of a Land of Canaan; from the ancient home of their ace they had fared forth, far away over the ocean into a oreign country; here they had settled now, here they pro-osed to strike root again; and here their seed would multiply rom generation to generation, ages without end. True mough, they had no hostile nations to fight against—and or that they should thank the Lord! Yet there were other attles, for the powers of darkness never rested; here were he long journeys to town, with their strong temptations;
ere was the force of heathendom, which constantly threat-ned them; and here, in all probability, would soon come wealth! Here was the endless prairie, so rich in its blessings f fertility, but also full of a great loneliness—a form of reedom which curiously affected the minds of strangers, specially those to whom the Lord had given a sad heart.
Even the bravest would find it hard to face and conquer the trangeness of it all, the hopeless chill, the overwhelming night of this great solitude.

The minister was now spinning out his thoughts and hold-ng them forth in the light for the people to see; he grew in greatness and power before their watching eyes, as he showed hem their own feelings during the lonely hours. But when ie even came to the grasshoppers at last, then Tönseten could no longer restrain himself; he had to make manifest is approval in some way or other. With a firm hand he ushed against the back of the person in front of him, gain-ng the room to spit which he greatly needed; then he looked around at the others triumphantly, as if to say: "Well, didn't I tell you—isn't he a wonderful minister?" . . . But there was no time to waste on such thoughts now!

For now the minister was busy with their future. . . .
Did they fully understand what the Lord had given them here—and were they sufficiently grateful to Him for it? . . .
The minister towered high and mighty before them. . . . In what manner had they thought to make use of the unbounded liberty which the Lord in His mercy had granted them? Here they were about to build a new kingdom—themselves to lay the foundations, themselves to raise the whole structure from the ground up. Had they begun to realize the greatness of that glorious responsibility which He had placed on their shoulders, and did they have sense enough in their heads to thank Him for it on bended knee? . . . He had spread before them here an opportunity the equal of which was unknown in human history; and here it would be tested out whether they could measure up to it—whether they were sprung from good stock or not—whether they were the children of free men or slaves. . . . Were they not glad of the chance? . . . Oh, they ought to sing like the birds of the plain in the morning sunrise—and then thank God, thank Him in all humility! In truth, they had not come here out of captivity and bondage—that, too, they should bear in mind in giving thanks. But they had found here the fairest promise that the Lord God had ever given to any people. . . .

The words came with thrilling meaning; they took on a richer glow, a brighter texture, as the minister fired to his subject. . . . There was one point, he cried, where they and the ancient Children of Israel paralleled each other in a striking manner. For the kingdom which they were founding here would be a work of praise, a blessing to coming generations, only in so far as they remained steadfast to the truths implanted in them as children by their fathers. There was no other foundation to build upon; indeed, what other refuge did men have? . . . And now he stood here in their presence on this great day, a frail messenger of the Lord, to bring them this solemn question: Would they do as the ten lost tribes of Israel did, and disappear out of the world, or would they do as the two tribes had done, and never perish among men? . . .

The minister's voice had sunk low, but his words bore in upon them with irresistible power; his eyes glowed with a secret light; his cheeks burned with the flush of his inspira on; all his boyish youthfulness had gone, and in its place as speaking the authority of ripe, mature experience.

The people sat and stood about while he was preaching, anging on every word he said. Only a few were competent climb the ladder of reasoning that he had raised for them. The others realized that he was preaching well, and let it o at that; it gave them a simple satisfaction just to listen; ney rejoiced in their hearts that such a man had come here o-day; they felt that he wished them well. And it was so ne and jolly, too, this gathering together; now there would e some excitement in the settlement. . . . One was thinking about the congregation that they would have to organize; nother about the location of the new church; still another bout the cemetery, as to where it would probably be located; nd to everyone the thought came that men would be needed o manage these activities; well, they would show him that ney could govern themselves, that they were a well-conucted people! . . . One woman had it in mind that they ould of course start a ladies' aid, now that they had a minster; and that would be great fun, with meetings and cakes nd coffee and sewing and all the rest; she proposed to begin ome embroidering at once! But those who had not yet een confirmed dreaded the ordeal a little, though at the same ime they were glad; at any rate, there would be a change n the daily monotony, and they would of course have some ine new clothes for the confirmation! . . . Tönseten had allen into deep and serious thought concerning a matter of reat importance—of very great importance. He was wonlering how he could manage to help the minister out in the nost valuable way. . . . Now, when the congregation was rganized, they would as a matter of course have to elect a klokker![1] Well, if he had been able to splice a couple so hat the knot held even before the Lord, he certainly ought to be able to serve as klokker. . . . He would have to see about it later on. . . .

[1] A church official having partly the duty of cantor and partly of sexton. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a candidatus heologiæ, when deemed too great a blockhead to receive ordination to the holy ministry, was often appointed klokker.

In the farthest corner by the stove sat a pale, delicate-featured woman, almost hidden by those in front of her. As soon as the minister began to talk she bent her head forward and a little to one side, until she had found an opening through which she could get a glimpse of his face. She listened intently to the sermon—at first with a wondering happy look, which slowly grew skeptical and sad; all the while her eyes did not release their hold on the speaker. As the sermon progressed, the expression on her face became covert and cunning; her lips moved as if she were making objections, but no sound came. . . . "That! No, that shall not happen—it shall not happen!" was what the face seemed to say. . . . "He is playing us false . . . this man . . . he will lead us to something that is not good." . . .

By her side sat a man with a handsome, fair-skinned little boy in his lap; the boy had sparkling blue eyes, which flitted about from face to face, looking at everyone, laughing mischievously when the look was caught and returned. . . . Now and then the man laid his hand on the woman's shoulder, as if to reassure her; then she smiled strangely; she had no time to look at him, but the smile seemed to say: "Don't worry, he shall not deceive me. . . . I understand it all. . . . He is sly, though, isn't he?" . . .

When the hymn following the sermon had been sung, the minister said to them:

"Now, it is my advice that those who have been sitting all this time, and have the strength to stand, change places with those who have been standing; in this way we may help to bear one another's burdens. Let the change be made with order and decency. . . . We shall now perform the holy act of baptism. I should appreciate it if all you grown people would remain, and thus call to mind your own sacred covenant with the Lord. . . . First let all unbaptized children come forward; and afterward those who have been christened at home."

At this a considerable disturbance arose in the crowd;

ome people got up and pushed their way out of the door, alking in low tones as they squeezed through the throng; t the same time several who had remained outside during he sermon pushed their way in; hitherto they had heard only he voice, but now they wanted to get a glimpse of the nan. . . .

Sörine came in with a basin of water which she placed on he table, and laid a clean towel beside it.

Those who were to hold the children now took them in heir arms and came forward; the sponsors stood up and ooked around; there was scant room to move in the stifling crush, and several people had to go out at this moment; but ittle by little the disorder subsided, so that the ceremony could begin.

Most of the grown people knew the baptismal hymn by heart, and although the air was heavy and close in the crowded hut, the singing rose with great fervour. There were fourteen children who had not been baptized, one of them only three weeks old—a tiny being whose arrival had been looked for in the fond hope that it might turn out to be a baby girl, as indeed it had, and who now lay sweetly sleeping in its mother's arms.

The first child to be baptized was four years old—a big, fat, dark-haired, hungry lump of a boy, who talked out loud and wanted to get down and run over to his mother. He didn't seem to appreciate in the least what was about to be done for him, and aroused a good deal of merriment among the onlookers. However, the ceremony soon went on with all proper calm and decorum. . . . Josie, the one for whom Tönseten had performed the marriage rite, came last of all; she had three children, and had striven hard to get them ready for this service; she carried the youngest in her own arms. Tönseten regarded her and her offspring with a certain fatherly pride, and folded his hands devoutly as she came forward.

Then came three children who had been privately baptized by laymen. Sörine advanced first, holding up for his second christening the child at whose birth she had been present and for whom she had once before stood sponsor; the boy awakened in the arms of his godmother, turning two bright blue eyes toward the minister; he laughed aloud and asked Sörine who that man was with the whiskers and the long black skirt? Sörine tried by petting him to hush him up. . . . "He doesn't have any pants!" said the boy, still laughing and putting his arms around her neck; those who stood near enough to overhear were doubled up with mirth.

But as the pastor asked the child's name and she gave it, and he repeated it clearly and distinctly, so as to be heard throughout the room—"Peder Victorious, dost thou renounce—" . . . something extraordinary happened. From out that pale face over in the corner came a sound of anguish. Beret rose up and pushed her way violently through the crowd, which moved aside in sudden alarm to let her pass, then closed immediately in behind her; Per Hansa tried to follow, but found it hard to make a passage through the throng, which now was crowding forward in order to get a better view; and all at once her voice, shrill and vibrant, pierced the room: "This evil deed shall not be done!" . . . She was already halfway there. Some blocked her passage; others tried to silence her. . . . "Oh, let me go!" she cried. "This sin shall not happen! How can a man be victorious out here, where the evil one gets us all! . . . Are you all stark mad?" Her cries were shrill and piercing; they rose with a wild tremor of anguish, striking terror into the hearts of the men who stood about, not knowing what to do; the women hid their faces and did not dare to look; some of the weaker-nerved began to weep hysterically; on one of the beds a little girl had thrown herself face downward, crying and screaming; two half-grown boys, overcome by the horror of it, silently pressed their cheeks against the sod wall; the doorway was now crowded with curious faces, one tier above another. All wanted to see what was going on.

The minister paused in the service.

"Take your wife outside, Peder Holm! The air in here is close and bad for a sick person. I will talk to her afterward. . . . And the rest of you—please keep quiet!"

It took some time to calm the morbid excitement. Per Hansa had finally reached Beret; he lifted her in his arms, but the people crowded around so densely that it was difficult to get through, and all the while Beret was striking out wildly, pulling and pushing in a frantic effort to escape. She foamed at the mouth. . . . "This is the work of the devil!" he muttered through clenched teeth. . . . "Now he will surely take my little boy! . . . God save us—we perish!"

The meeting lasted inordinately long. When the pastor was finally through he announced divine services again two weeks from the following Sunday; at that time he would return to them and conduct Communion. "There must be many of you who need to unburden your hearts before your God and Father in Heaven!" he went on impressively. "We shall begin the service here in this room, promptly at eleven o'clock." Hesitating for a moment, he looked around at the people and a tired smile crossed his face; in a lower voice he continued: "It would not be amiss, I think, if you men were to dress up a little; to the Lord it makes no difference, but it would seem more like the Lord's day for you, and you would be edified thereby."

IV

After the service the people remained standing around in groups out in the yard, talking about the minister and the sermon, and discussing in low tones the sad thing that had happened that day. The latter event claimed most of their attention. Everyone felt great sympathy for this family on whom adversity had laid such a heavy hand; some thought it was very wrong for Per Hansa to keep a person like Beret at home; a tragedy might happen at any time—and then it would be too late; various incidents of this kind were recalled; some remembered also that Per Hansa himself was a hard-hearted sinner who needed serious admonition; but they were all sorry for him, just the same.

None of the people of the house were to be seen. The crowd outside stood looking around, as if waiting for something to happen; no one wanted to leave until he knew. . .

A few women were still inside the house; they had planned to stay and help put things in order. Among them was Sörine, still carrying the child in her arms. The women were plainly anxious and disturbed; they talked in subdued voices and couldn't seem to take hold of the work with any heart.

The minister had seated himself at the table, folded his hands, and laid his head upon them; thus he sat for a long while in silence; then, as if noticing the people in the room for the first time, he got up and walked over to the group of women.

"I would suggest," he said, gently, "that you all go home. Only let some one of you who is well acquainted here remain to help; if more are needed, we will send for you. . . . Let me have that fine little boy awhile," he said to Sörine. . . . "Of course, I think it would be better if you all came often to see her, but never more than one at a time. And never ask her how she is feeling; just take it for granted that everything is as it should be. To me, things do not look entirely hopeless here; I believe it will all come right in the end. Yes, I truly believe it." . . . He took the boy on his knee, and began to play with him.

"God grant that it might happen as he says!" sighed Kjersti.

The minister heard her.

"In His name, nothing is impossible! . . . Now I should leave at once, if I were you. Let the one who is best acquainted here, stay behind."

Then the minister took the boy in his arms and went out into the yard; he approached each group standing there, talked to them quietly, and advised them to go home and keep to themselves as much as they could. . . . "For the word of God," he said, "is like seed put into the ground; it must be undisturbed, if it is to germinate and bear fruit; but if it is too deeply covered, it will fail." . . .

"We were just talking about organizing a congregation, ou see." The speaker looked in astonishment at the min-ter. Could it be wrong to discuss that idea?

"The time for that will come later on, without a doubt." . . . The minister raised his voice. . . . "Now I will ask ach one of you kindly to go to his own home, remain quiet he rest of the day, and think about what you have heard."

"Well, yes—that's probably all right, of course . . . but nyhow . . ."

The minister turned away and went to another group; the nan had to quit talking and make the best of it. But he nought to himself: this must be a funny sort of minister who asn't time to discuss such an important matter as organizing congregation!

Group after group broke up and melted away; people noved slowly homeward, and soon there was no one left n the yard; the day had closed and night was fast coming on.

The minister remained outside for some time, walking about the yard, still clad in his canonical robe; the boy tod-dled along beside him, hanging on to the black gown as if it were a great joke, and thoroughly enjoying himself with this queer man.

At length the minister bent his steps toward the new sod stable, from which seemed to come the sound of voices and the whimpering cry of a child; he took up the boy in his arms, went over to the door, pushed it open, and stepped in-side. The room had no windows; it was so dark in there that as he peered about, coming straight from the twilight, he could not make out the objects clearly. He was at once aware, however, of the presence of people; he walked farther in, looking around for what he knew was there.

They were sitting on a bundle of hay—Per Hansa and Beret, she with her face pressed close against his, he with one arm about her neck and the other about her waist; And-Ongen clung to her father's shoulder, her arms clasped tightly around his neck.

"The sweet peace of God be upon you!" said the pastor, gently, as soon as he had discovered them. "The people have all gone. And now, Mother Holm, I should like very much to have you cook us a good cup of coffee, if there is any in your house; I want to take supper with you."

The sound of his voice startled Beret. She sat up, brushed her hair back, and looked around with a puzzled expression. She felt abashed, just like a modest person with too few clothes on who unexpectedly finds himself in the presence of others.

"Oh, is this where we are?" she muttered, bending over and covering her eyes.

"I want something to eat!" cried the boy, tearing himself from the minister as soon as he heard his mother's voice.

She seized the child frantically and hugged him close to her; pushing her face down in the hollow of his neck, she drank and drank. . . .

"No, no, Beret—don't be so violent!" begged her husband. "Please be careful!"

Then she threw back her head, the pale face flushed and distorted. "Am I not to love my own child!"

The minister came up to her and laid his hand on her head. "That's quite right, Mother Holm! Love him all you can; but do not forget to thank Him who has given you this precious gift. There is the promise of a splendid man in that fine boy; you will surely have much joy in him!"

Beret ceased caressing the boy and sat bent over him, listening to the words of the minister. Then she rose hurriedly and smoothed down her dress; again the minister got the impression that in some curious way she felt ashamed. Without saying a word, she took a child by either hand and walked out of the stable.

Per Hansa remained sitting on the pile of hay, resting his head on one hand; his hair and beard were unkempt, and quite grizzled now; his face was deeply furrowed, as if by the marks of a ruthless hand; his whole figure seemed fearfully ravaged and broken, like a forest maple shattered by a storm.

The minister sat down beside him; he began to confess Per Hansa with all the gentleness of a sympathetic and understanding pastor.

"Now tell me everything. Two can carry what one alone not lift. Tell me everything from the beginning."

Without changing his position, Per Hansa looked down at hay, sighed, and began to talk in broken accents: "I don't derstand it myself, you see. . . . I only know that damna- n has come down upon us. . . . It can't continue much ger—I'll probably have to send her away." Again he ned, and then became silent.

t seemed to the minister as if the sum total of human gedy sat talking to him. . . . A chill had entered the dimly nted room.

"Perhaps you are right . . . otherwise, the cross might come too heavy for you to bear!"

A long pause fell.

"But she is not entirely deranged, is she?"

"Partly or entirely—what difference does it make? If the dle is cracked, it's cracked. . . ."

"Maybe so . . . yes, yes. . . ."

Still looking down at the hay, Per Hansa continued:

"I don't know that I am guilty of any other wrong toward - than that our oldest boy came before we were married; - in that matter we were equally to blame. . . . And then brought her out here. I suppose that there is where the l trouble lies. . . . I don't believe she grieves much about t other affair. . . . No, it's this business out here—and - the life of me I can't see any sin in it."

"I think I understand," said the minister, gently.

"But is a man to refuse to go where his whole future calls, ly because his wife doesn't like it?" . . . The question rang out of Per Hansa's soul, as if he were for the first ne opening the door to many years of pent-up suffering. e turned his strong, resolute face toward the minister, beg- ng for an answer.

"Indeed he may, my good man," said the minister, ear- stly. "But it would be better if they were both agreed on it."

"Agreed, yes—easy enough to say! . . . When the only sagreement, for instance, was that she advised waiting another year! . . . And it isn't so much what she has sc since we came out here. . . . Now, I wish you would t me—" Per Hansa spoke softly, almost diffidently. "Suppo a husband and wife cannot agree—what, then, is he to do

The minister felt through the question the aching need the man for relief and comfort.

"Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, a shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh he quoted. "There you have the Lord's decree. But if t law applies to man, it must apply to woman as well. Betwe you two there has, as I understand it, been no real disagre ment?"

Per Hansa shook his head; the words came with gre difficulty:

"I sometimes wonder if there ever were two people wl cared quite as much for each other as we do. . . . But th hasn't made things any easier; you can't lift the ocea whether it rages in a storm or lies quiet in a flat calm. . . And now, please tell me, you who are a minister and unde stand the Scriptures, What is the man to do?" Per Han grasped the minister by the arm, clutching hard in his te rible agitation.

"He shall humble himself before the Lord his God, a shall take up his cross to bear it with patience!" said t minister, impressively.

"Ha-ha!" Per Hansa suddenly burst out in a bitter laug "That's too scanty a fare for me to live on. You'd bett put that kind of talk aside. . . . I ask as an ignorant ma and I must have an answer that I can understand: Did I right or did I do wrong when I brought her out here? A what should I have done instead, when I saw nothing el ahead of me in the world?"

"That time you undoubtedly did right, my good man, what you have told me is true; a man must go whither h heart and mind lead him, unless the Lord comes and says n . . . You did right that time; but since then you have l yourself sink into the mire of a great sin, as I am told. A now you grumble—like those Israelites of yore—because t d is leading you on paths that you do not wish to follow. . You are not willing to bear your cross with humility!" No, I am not; and let me tell you something more." Per nsa's voice hardened. "We find other things to do out e than to carry crosses!" Then he fell silent. The min- r tried to find words with which to reprove him; but in a ment Per Hansa began again—and now it was he who uked the minister: "My experience has been that it is ghty easy for one to talk about things he has not tried! . I have sweat blood over this thing—and now I'm no ger equal to it. . . . Have you ever thought what it means a man to be in constant fear that the mother may do ay with her own children—and that, besides, it may be his lt that she has fallen into that state of mind?"

When the minister finally answered, he had become all tleness again. "No, thanks and praise to God, such afflic- n He has spared me!" He put one arm over Per Hansa's ulder. "Tell me how all this came about."

Per Hansa sat for a while without answering; he seemed e a man trying to climb a steep hill, whose strength has en out; all at once he got up and went over to the door, nding there and looking out a long time into the darkness the night. The minister followed him. . . .

"There isn't much to say about such things," Per Hansa gan. "She has never felt at home here in America. . . . ere are some people, I know now, who never should emi- ate, because, you see, they can't take pleasure in that which to come—they simply can't see it! . . . And yet, she has ver reproached me. And in spite of everything, we got ng fairly well up to the time when our last child was born. . Yes, the one you baptized to-day. . . . Then she took a tion that she was going to die—but I didn't understand it the time. . . . She has never had the habit of fault-find- g. . . . She struggled hard when the child was born, and all thought she wouldn't survive—or him, either. That's y we had to baptize him at once. In my heedless joy, after worst was over and things had turned out all right, I went and gave him that second name. . . . And then everythi seemed to go to pieces!"

"That name . . . ?"

"Yes, the second name. It was very wrong of me, I kno I see that now."

"What are you saying, man? Such a beautiful name!"

Per Hansa looked at him. . . . "Do you really mean it

"Of course I mean it! It is the handsomest name I c ever remember giving to any child. Peder Victorious—wh it sings like a beautiful melody!"

"Please tell me—is it really a human name? And was it a sacrilege on my part?" asked Per Hansa, incredulous hardly daring yet to acknowledge his joy.

"My dear man, have you worried about that, too?"

"Have I? . . . Don't mention it! . . . You mean that t name is all right?"

"Yes, indeed," said the minister without hesitatio "There is nothing unusual about it, except that you ha happened to find a more beautiful form than I have y heard; the name itself is common in all languages."

Per Hansa gazed at the minister, bringing his face close t in order to see him better in the growing dusk of the evenin Slowly his eyes began to light with a new courage; he to a deep breath, and straightened his body up for the fir time in many a long day.

"I must ask you again, for I am an ignorant man: Is th really true? . . . And won't you please tell her the sam thing, too—as soon as you can?"

"I certainly will. . . . So she does not like the name?"

"No; that's the trouble. . . . She believes it is an idea th the devil himself has given me in order to get us more com pletely in his power—but this we didn't realize before h mind began to cloud. Now she can't bear to hear the nam that's why the attack came on her this afternoon, when y fastened it on the boy for good. . . . I was afraid, too, th something like that might happen."

"Well, well! Is this possible? How long has she h these attacks?"

It began with the grasshoppers. . . . However, she's als had the heavy heart to fight against. . . . And then, se fears of hers—just utter fancies! Can you understand a person gets possessed by fear, right on the level, solid und?"

"You say it began with the grasshoppers?"

"Well, sir, I came home from work one evening to find a zy woman! . . . She thought it was the devil himself o had cast the plague upon us—and maybe she wasn't far ng in that, either! . . . Pretty soon she began to see ons of her mother, who had been dead for some time
n, though we hadn't got the news. . . ."

"What's that you are saying?"

"Yes, sir, she saw her mother; and, will you believe it, knew that her mother was dead half a year before the er came! . . . Oh, you can't imagine how bad it was!"
e terrors that he had lived through seemed fairly to choke n as he remembered the awful scenes.

"She could not have actually seen a dead person! She st have been seriously deranged."

"Yes—may God help us!—she both saw her and talked h her! . . . One night I lay asleep, the first summer after grasshoppers had come. I had saved my whole crop and it in. Suddenly I was awakened by some one talking ud in the room. And there she was, pacing back and forth the middle of the floor and talking to her mother, exactly though she were sitting by her side. . . . I know that she v her, I tell you; and the child—she was carrying the ld in her arms!" . . . Per Hansa's breath failed him for noment. . . . "'It's no use, mother,' she said. 'The boy n't come to you with a name that Satan has tricked Per o giving him!' Those were the very words she used. I up, lighted a candle, and as I watched her pacing there, h the little fellow in her arms, then, at last, I saw how it s with her . . . I saw it then. Until that time I had reed to believe it. . . . Pastor," whispered Per Hansa, "do u know what it means to feel the skin creep up your
k?" . . .

"Did she try to harm the child?"

"Not then." He shook his head. "I can't say whether s had such thoughts or not; but she took the notion that h mother wanted the child with her. . . . The rest came late Per Hansa pulled himself together with a strong effort. . "It will be two years this summer; it happened toward ev ning, one day when the grasshoppers came in such numbe that it was hard to see the sky. If Sörrina, our neighbo woman, hadn't been making us a visit, it's hard telling . but there she sat, holding the child."

"The Lord show mercy unto you!"

"Well may you say it! . . . That afternoon, when t grasshoppers began to beat like hail against the walls, s remembered that some of the little fellow's clothes were lyi outside to dry. She ran out to get them, but when she pick them up there was nothing left but a few tatters of clot . . . Then the spell came over her in an instant, you unde stand. She ran into the house like a mad woman, wailin 'Now the devil has come for your clothes. . . . He'd bett have you, too. . . . Until he gets you we will have no peace . . . Then she grabbed for the child!" Per Hansa groan aloud. . . . "But what might have been in her mind I cann say. I forgot to tell you," he went on, controlling himse once more, "that the very night before, her mother was the room with her; Beret talked with her just as plainly as now stand here talking to you. She had got up and dress herself, and was telling her mother all about everything, t way women do . . . and, would you believe it, she want to cook coffee for her! . . . We aren't so poor as all that she told her mother."

"And how was it afterward?" the minister asked, deep moved.

"Well, you see," said Per Hansa, wiping his eyes, "I ha to do something about it. So I persuaded her to let Sörri take the child during the summer."

"You got her to agree to that?"

"Yes, after a while; at first she wouldn't hear of it, b finally she gave in. And now I don't know whether I d at or wrong; I believe it hurt her terribly to have the e fellow gone. I saw how she wandered about the room, f longing to care and do for him, but he was not there. . And one night after the plague came—I couldn't lie ke every night, you know—she got up quietly and stole r to the house where he was. . . . She wanted to get the d. Whether she intended to do him harm or not, none us can be sure. She told Sörrina and Hans Olsa that tors had come from afar, asking to see the boy, and so must have him; there wasn't any way out of it. Yes t's what she said!"

"The Lord has certainly laid a heavy cross upon you! But member, He will remove it in His own good time! . . . w, tell me, how is she between these attacks?"

"Well, you see, she may be all right for months; one who never known her well would hardly suspect that anything s wrong with her during this time; she does her work like the rest of us. In the dead of winter, of course, when the zzards are raging and we don't see any other folks for eks at a time, she has days when she seems to go all to ces; but I hardly reckon that as the disease—that sort of ng happens to a good many of us, let me tell you!"

"What do you intend to do about it this summer?"

"This summer?" . . . Per Hansa's face was drawn with r as he turned to the minister. . . . "If Satan lets his sts loose upon us again this summer, then I don't know at will happen!"

The minister patted him on the shoulder:

"Take no thought for the morrow! The plague cannot t forever. And remember that the Lord is always near. the number of thy days, so shall thy strength be. And w take this advice from me: From now on keep close to r; be toward her as you were during those happy days en you first got her; let your affection warm her into the derstanding that it is good to be human; and lighten her rdens in every way. . . . Above everything, do not take r child away from her again. You will simply have to be watchful as you can. . . . And now I will perhaps stay here to-night; arrange it so that I can be alone with h awhile to-morrow." . . .

The minister gazed before him in deep thought, his hea wrung with pity and compassion. "Perhaps the Lord w allow me to reach her mind with a clarifying idea. His wo is living life and can move mountains. . . . When I retu you must take her to Communion."

His hand was patting the shoulder on which it reste Per Hansa wept, his sobs coming in short gasps that sho his frame; he experienced a blessing descending upon hi and his burden grew lighter. There was much more wanted to say, but just now he could not speak. . . .

A long pause followed; then the minister spoke agai "Let us not stand here longer in fear and darkness, talki about sad things; our bodies need nourishment."

They walked across the yard in the quiet prairie evenin Per Hansa so happy that he could gladly have offered t minister his whole crop as it stood in all its beauty . . . a he had a hundred acres seeded in, counting it near and fa

Just as they reached the door of the hut somebody rounde the corner on the run and called in a quick, scared voic "Father!"

Both men jumped, so suddenly had the figure come out the darkness.

"Is that you, Ola? What are you up to, anyway?"

"Father, come here!" The boy grasped Per Hansa by th arm and tried to pull him along. "Hans is sitting up on th Indian mound, crying and taking on! I can't get him come home!"

"Is he sick?"

"No!"

"What's the matter with him, then?" The father sho the boy.

"He is afraid of mother . . . you must come right away

The boy sped away into the darkness.

Per Hansa gave the minister a look which seemed to sa "Now you see how things are here!" . . . And all the rad ance that for a moment had lighted up his soul was sudden ke out. He asked the minister to enter. . . . "Tell them t I and the boys will be right along." . . . Then he too appeared.

The minister stood there for a while in deep uncertainty; ast he turned toward the door, made the sign of the cross ront of it, said a prayer, then opened it and went in.

. . But across the fields ran Ole, and the father went er him.

"Where is he?"

"Over there!"

"You run home. I guess I can find him. Is it over there the grave?"

"Yes . . . here . . . "

Ole vanished on the other side of the mound.

"Store-Hans, where are you keeping yourself?"

A smothered cry came through the darkness.

Per Hansa followed the sound and almost stumbled over writhing form which lay on the ground; he bent over and ed it up in his arms.

"Hansy-boy, what's the matter?"

The father sat down with the limp, slender body of the y in his arms, rocking and lulling it.

"Is . . . is . . . mother queer again?"

"No, indeed! Mother is all right, and now supper is dy."

"Did . . . did she . . . kill Permand?"

Per Hansa took a firmer hold of the boy, got up, and rted to run.

"Did she do it?"

The father spoke harshly:

"I don't want to hear any more of such wicked talk! other is all right . . . all of us are . . . and now she has pper ready, and everything." He stopped and set the boy wn. "Now wipe your face—we can't come into the house s way." . . . The father began to dry the boy's tear-ined face. "You must wash yourself as soon as you get the house," he said, gently, taking the boy by the hand.

V

Nothing out of the ordinary happened that evening. Whe the minister came into the hut he greeted them in an eve voice, "God's peace upon this house!" Then he took off h vestments, folded them up and put them in his valise, looke around for a chair, and sat down. And now that he ha removed his official garb he looked like a different man; th special odour of sanctity that had rested on him seemed have departed; he sat there quietly, having little to say, lool ing like a man who has just passed through a great hardsh and is very tired. . . . The table was set for supper; upo it had been placed one candle, and another stood on a litt shelf by the stove. Sörine was still in the house, bustlin about and helping with the meal; And-Ongen sat on one the beds, playing with her baby brother, who had bee washed and dressed for the night and was now ready to b put to sleep. Sörine kept talking and laughing with th children as she worked, and an air of cheerfulness had com over the room.

Beret stood by the stove, bent over, washing some pots an pans; she glanced once over her shoulder at the minister a he sat down; but very soon she had to look again. And the she did something that she often wondered at afterward she wiped her hands, took a clean bowl from the cupboar filled it with fresh milk, and offered it to him, saying: "Hav some milk, please, to stay your hunger while you wait."

The minister took the bowl without looking at her; h emptied it at one draught, put it down, and thanked her i a few brief words.

Almost immediately Beret grew bashful and uneasy ove what she had done; in her nervousness she picked up a shi that she was making for one of the boys, sat down by th candlelight near the stove, and began to sew as hard as sh could; but she kept her face turned away from the ministe

Per Hansa and the boys came in; Sörine announced tha supper was ready; the four men sat down and began th meal. The minister looked at the younger boy; his face wa

llen, his eyes were red with weeping; a heavy veil seemed ide his handsome features. At the sight of the boy the ister felt more like crying than eating; a sudden revulsion came him. Laying down his knife and fork, he asked another bowl of milk, which he emptied slowly, and then ted for the others to get through. When he thought they finished, he folded his hands on the table and began to y to the unseen one whose presence was always near.

o quickly did he begin, that at first Per Hansa didn't ize what was going on and was on the point of asking minister what he said. The same thing happened to the ers: Ole had just discovered that he wasn't quite satisfied, l was reaching for another piece of bread; Sörine was ut to offer them all more coffee. But Beret sat bowed r her sewing, trying to catch every word; she took a few ches, and then the work dropped to her lap; something pelled her to turn and look at him. The light of the dle cast a reddish gleam over his face; his beard seemed re silvery than ever; the countenance was that of a good ld who is tired and wants to be put to bed. . . . His voice s gentle and low. . . . He is really a fine man, thought ret, and kept on listening. . . .

During the summer there are at times dark days on the airie; the rain is cold, the fog dreary and dank, sticking one's clothes like wool. But it may happen that toward ening, just as the day is nearly done, a curtain is suddenly awn aside; in the western sky appears a window—not built the hand of man—all luminous with splendour; out of it nes a radiance clearer and more glorious than anything eye has ever beheld; all around the window night and rkness hang suspended like draperies—they too radiating lory not of this world. . . . Thus was the splendour which w pervaded Per Hansa's sod house. All had folded their nds without knowing it. Over on the bed the play con-ued; happy laughter arose, though it did not seem to dis-b the prayer. But after a while that also quieted down.
. Then Permand heard the voice of the one he had been ying with earlier in the evening; it tempted him so hard that he could not resist; clad in his little nightdress, crawled out of the bed, toddled across the earthen floor the minister, put both hands on the knees that rose befo him, and looked up merrily into the man's face. All w saw it felt shocked at the impropriety; they wanted to st the child, but only feared a greater impropriety in anythi they might do. Per Hansa was on the point of speaki sharply, but his voice failed; Sörine thought of snatchi the child away, but only remained motionless and agha . . . "I suppose I shall have to do it myself," thought Ber —yet she, too, could not get up from her chair. . . . T child had entered a glory where no one dared to follow. . Without interrupting his flow of words, the minister lift the boy onto his knees, folded the baby hands within h own, and went on with the prayer. . . . "Oh, this is t bad!" cried Beret to herself, struggling to rise. "The child nightshirt is dirty—he mustn't sit there!" But still she cou not get up from her chair: the one with whom the minist was talking stood too near. . . . The words flowed on wit out a pause, softly and sweetly, like the warm rain of a sum mer evening. It was as if the minister had much to confi to that other one; the other one seemed to be objecting, if He hesitated to do what was asked; then the minist prayed more fervently; not that he raised his voice—th words came with the same gentleness—but he threw h whole soul into them, as if he refused on any account give in.

At last he came to the little boy who sat there on his lap the child he had christened that day. And it seemed almo uncanny to listen to what he said; one could hardly make o whether he was talking to the unseen being or to the b himself; at times it sounded as if they might be one and t same. . . . He laid his hand tenderly on the child's hea his eyes seemed closed, but the words had caught a ne inspiration; to those who listened, it seemed a wonderf thing . . .

"Set him aside, O God," the pastor prayed, "as Thou did formerly with Thy chosen ones in times of yore! . . . S aside, and consecrate him as a true Nazarene! . . . him indeed fulfil the promise of his splendid name and ome a true victor here, both over himself and for the ation of his people. . . . And now may Thy blessed ce rest on this house, for ever and ever . . . Amen!"

He sat with closed eyes for some time, his hand still rest- on the boy's head; the others were very still. Beret mbled throughout her body; a choking feeling came over and at last she had to cough. She glanced down in con- on at her sewing.

I haven't done this right!" she thought, distractedly, try- to calm herself. She looked at the sewing again, got up etch the shears, and ripped out what she had been doing.

Then the minister began to play with the boy, in a natural, py way; and in a little while they both seemed to be hav- great fun. But he didn't have anything to say to the ers; and they, in turn, couldn't find anything to say to him.

But the next morning, as they sat at the breakfast table, minister was both merry and talkative, and helped him- so liberally to the food that it was a pleasure just to see n do it. He asked many questions regarding the life and ditions in that vicinity, and showed himself so well in- med about farming that Per Hansa asked, without think- whether he had ever been a farmer. . . . Then he sud- ly remembered what the minister had told him to do the ning before; he got up hastily, called to the boys, and y left the house together.

The moment they were gone Beret grew very uneasy; she nd her sewing again, and sat down with it in a furtive, barrassed way. The minister could see nothing unusual out her, except that her face was so singularly childlike; s impression came mostly from the way she used her eyes; was hard to find them, because she kept looking down in treme bashfulness and timidity; nor could he seem to easily w her into conversation.

He came over and stood beside her chair.

"Well, now, Mrs. Holm, I have a request to make of you.

Two weeks from next Sunday I shall return; and then plan to conduct Communion services here in your house."

Beret was so astonished to hear these words, that she fo got herself for a moment and looked straight at him.

"Here in our sod house?"

"Yes, right here in your house, where you live every d . . . Don't you think it would be a blessing for you to co to the Lord with your sins and taste the sweetness of H mercy?" he said in a quiet voice.

"Here . . . ?" she asked, greatly agitated. "Oh no—tl would never do—oh no! . . . It's too filthy and dirty he . . . There's too much . . . it's unclean!" . . . She stopp abruptly, blushed scarlet, and looked down into her lap aga

"No doubt there is much sin here," resumed the minist "That I am sure of. But the Lord will sanctify the hou for us. . . . And now I want you to plan how nicely can arrange it for His blessed purposes. Let us consider t matter before I leave." He looked around the room. "T table had better be taken out—that will give us more roo That big chest we can perhaps use as the altar—that is, your husband could fix up something for railing. We cou probably find some fitting material to cover both that a the chest; perhaps you had better talk to the neighbo women about it." . . . The minister talked on as if ever thing were decided, with only the responsibility for its ex cution left in her hands.

She gave him a quick look; her cheeks were flushed.

"That is my father's chest . . . it is a nice chest, too."

The voice had grown querulous again and bore the sa childlike expression; the minister made no reply. He to her hand, thanked her briefly for her hospitality, and hurri out of the room. When he got outside his forehead w damp with perspiration. He saw Per Hansa coming in direction, but turned away to avoid him. . . .

When Beret sat down awhile later to dress the little b she felt that she could sing aloud to-day—felt that she h to sing, that she could not help it. Both words and melo seemed to rise in her throat; it was the baptismal hymn th y had used the previous day, and she sang all the verses. .. While she sang she handled the boy so gently . . . as he were almost afraid to touch him. . . .

VI

There was much stir and activity all through that summer l fall of '77; many schooners sailed across the wide prairie, l with them came always excitement. The greater number them, however, went drifting past, pushing still farther stward into the sun glimmer; but there were others that chored in the settlement and tied up for good. Many were re already, and sod houses grew up like ant hills. . . . ospects seemed favourable here, they said, especially if e would take the time to look around. The soil was prob- y just as good here as farther west. . . . Well, why not it here? . . .

The Sognings in particular were clever at hanging on to ospective settlers: "No use talking, you couldn't find bet- land than this, if you searched clear to the Pacific coast! s far as land is concerned, you might just as well settle re. . . . And this is an old settlement now, the community ll organized, with schools and everything. . . . You can sily get help for both plowing and building." . . . The gnings were practical folk, and good talkers, besides; and they had elected a committee to advise all land seekers at passed through the settlement; this committee had in- rmed itself—at least, it talked that way—about every quar- r section that was not yet taken.

The grasshopper plague had raged frightfully that season, t they would probably soon be rid of it—and, thank God, took neither man nor beast! This year, too, the hay was ared, and some of their crops had been saved from year year; several of the farmers even had a little ready money ft, after buying the absolutely necessary articles of food d clothing. The herds of live stock were growing con- antly, and now the flocks of poultry, larger and larger each season, helped to pay for many of the things that one h to buy.

One fine day a strange monster came writhing westwa over the prairie, from Worthington to Luverne; it was t greatest and the most memorable event that had yet happen in these parts. The monster crawled along with a terrif speed; but when it came near, it did not crawl at all; rushed forward in tortuous windings, with an awful roa while black, curling smoke streaked out behind it in the a People felt that day a joy that almost frightened them; f it seemed now that all their troubles were over, that the could be no more hardships to contend with—at least, th was what the Sognings solemnly affirmed. . . . For now th the railway had come as far as this, it wouldn't take lo before they would see it winding its way into Sioux Fall Indeed, if this wasn't a place fit to live in now, where wou one find it?—that the Sognings would like to know. . . Good neighbours, schools, the finest kind of land, a railroa and everything—what more could anyone wish? . . .

That summer a number of houses went up to the wes ward of Spring Creek. Before the minister had come th first time, Hans Olsa had already hauled the materials f both dwelling and barn; now he was building. After th first year he had gone into stock raising; he had the large herd in the settlement, and was doing very well—for thos days. . . . And Tönseten, after receiving absolution for h great sin, had become all aglow with high ambitions; h prospects were bright of being elected klokker—perhaps de con, too; life for him was positively glorious, just one gra song. All day his head was full of the idea that he, to ought to build himself a respectable house. But the pla never seemed to materialize; he still lived in the old s house. At last Kjersti would lose her temper whenever t project was mentioned. The hut was good enough, she sai besides, they had no one to build for! This latter fact, ho ever, she didn't refer to oftener than seemed absolutely nece sary; it only made her husband sulky, and then he would c

· names, like "whimpering Jane" or "weeping willow."
. He probably wasn't to blame, poor fellow, after all. . . .
n the fall Henry Solum built an immense barn; he saw tt Hans Olsa had done well by raising cattle, and intended follow his example; the dwelling house could wait until got some one to take care of it—and that might be next mmer, if everything went as it should. . . . East of the ek, too, framed houses were rising above the sod huts.
e Irish, west by the sloughs, were a little slower about lding; there things made scant progress until the follow-year. The pest had raged worse in that locality than ywhere else, because the land lay lower. And the Irish ed with native caution. They have a wise proverb which vs that a good barn may perhaps pay for a decent house, t no one has ever heard of a fine dwelling that paid for a ent barn. . . . These words of wisdom they believed—d put them into practice.

The new houses seemed so out of place, standing up on e open, bare prairie. Did they really belong there? They ked so defiant! . . . And that was exactly what the save storm thought when he came along, winter or summer, nd these unheard-of objects in his way, puffed and eezed, took firm hold, and roared in anger. Well, per-ps he did more than that; it happened now and then that house would be toppled over, or shattered and torn to ces; but no matter how hard the storm raged and fumed
d growled and took on about it, most of the houses reained standing, and their numbers steadily increased as the ars went by. And the groves of trees which the settlers d striven so hard to plant and rear—they stretched and read, they grew in height and breadth and richness every mmer. As they grew they hid the houses, except where e driveway was to come in, when plans and visions became ality. There were settlers, even, who wooded themselves so completely—perhaps to keep out all evil—that their uses could not be seen at all until one came inside the
ove. . . .

VII

The weather was beautiful on the Sunday of the Cor munion service; the pest had already begun, but only th form of it which bred in the soil there at home; nothing h come yet out of the sky. To-day a light breeze was blowi from the southwest; there was just heat enough to be cor fortable; the air swept one's face like a soft, silken veil. T young people felt like taking off their clothes; the sun qui ered down through a greenish-blue haze far off in the de sky; and over on the prairie the first meadow lark had su that morning. Both the lark and the robin had found the way out there the second summer after the settlers came.

Several folks had arrived ahead of the appointed time, ar were standing in little groups around Per Hansa's hous most of them had walked over, but those who lived farth away had come jolting along in a lumber wagon, the loa and the jolting apparently increasing together. The peop were all laughing and talking together, full of life and fu from their actions no one would have gathered that th were on their way to church.

Old Aslak Tjöme, who lived just northwest of Sam Solur brought his wife in a wheelbarrow. She had fractured h hip on the ice that spring and was still unable to walk. . . "God only knows when she's going to get well again!" sa Aslak. "It's too bad, because even when she is well I hav no more help than I need." . . . And Aslak was bringing h wife to church for this reason: he had a notion—just notion—that if the minister would lay his hands on her sh might gain faster. . . . Anyhow, there was no harm in tr ing. . . . Aslak, with his wife in the wheelbarrow, made funny sight; he had rigged up a high back-rest for her an had fixed a seat in the barrow, covered with a sheepskin rug on this she sat like a queen on her throne. On either sid of the wheelbarrow he had fastened short poles, connectin them with a rope. The woman clung to the rope with on hand; in the other she held a hymn book wrapped in a whi handkerchief.

Folks passing them stopped and laughed, and offered to lh awhile. "Oh no, thank you!" said Aslak, merrily. ow I can manage her alone; but it hasn't always been thus o, indeed!" Then he laughed again as he pushed on, and ked lovingly at her. She nodded and smiled, laughing k at him. . . . "You take my place and let me push hile!" . . . That gave them a good laugh together.

The minister had reached the settlement the evening before l had stayed overnight at Per Hansa's. That morning y had been up early, had hurried through the breakfast, l immediately after had started to put the house in order - the service. It had been thoroughly cleaned and tidied before he came. All kinds of wild flowers that were to found on the prairie had been gathered and hung in bou-ts of various sizes under the ceiling, or put into glasses l bowls that stood around in every conceivable place. ere was something strange and haphazard about it, as if had been done by children in play. . . . As the minister ked around, a chill hand seemed to clutch his heart. . . .

The table had been carried outside and the big chest placed gonally in one corner, just as he had directed on his first it. Per Hansa had constructed a long, low bench, made of several small benches; this ran along in front of the est and was covered with two rugs that Sörine had ought over; the chest itself was draped with a white cloth. he minister took the paten and the chalice and placed them the improvised altar; he also asked for the two candle-cks he had noticed the other time, and when they had been ought and fitted with candles, he set them on either end of e chest. Over the cold stove they spread another rug; sterday the boys had stripped off a whole tubful of wil-v leaves; these were now brought in and scattered around the floor.

The result was satisfactory. The minister looked around; had scarcely spoken since he came. . . . "Now I am going er to the other hut to dress for the service; I shall be ere until it is time to begin, and would rather not be dis-bed." . . . He glanced at the wife, then at the husband, and said as he went out, "God grant to both of you a blesse Communion!"

Entering the other hut, where he had slept the previou night, the minister slowly began to put on his canonical His lips moved in prayer; his brow was wet with perspir tion. When he had dressed he sat down on the edge of th bed and leaned his head on one hand. As he sat there, h bowed figure seemed strangely powerless and insignifican the strength that he had so fervently prayed for at this hou he had not received. When he finally took the books fro the valise his hand trembled. His face looked pale and tire now he felt the need of a strong faith—and when he soug it he sought in vain! . . .

. . . In him the faith was lacking; of that he was pain fully aware.

With a supreme effort he got up from the bed and wen out into the yard.

When he reached the other house it was packed full o people; the elders had found places in the front of the room there also sat Aslak Tjöme with his wife, the invalid woma comfortably propped up at his side; Per Hansa and his wif sat on the very first bench, right in front of the improvise altar. The minister scanned the crowd, paused for a momen then came forward and spoke calmly to Per Hansa: "Now when the service begins, you two will please come forwar first. As soon as you have received Communion, you ha better go outside, for it will be hot and stuffy in here." The he went from person to person, writing down the names o the communicants; at once a deep silence fell on the room.

As the text for the Communion sermon the minister ha chosen The Glory of the Lord; rather, he had not chosen it— it had suggested itself powerfully to him on the day he ha gone away after talking with Beret. He had at once recog nized the fitness of the theme. And now, to-day, it ha returned to him with overwhelming force; here sat peopl who, perhaps for many years, had had no chance, no singl opportunity, to confess their sins before the Lord and receiv His blessed remission. Among them was one soul, sore pe xed, that he must try to reach. . . . He had seen clearly his last visit—at least, he thought he had seen—that what woman needed above everything else was the gladness of vation, the abiding joy that issues out of the faith and firm conviction that life is good because the Lord Himself s ordained it all. . . . Until he faced her he had felt so ppy over the theme. . . . Ah, well, perhaps the Lord would uchsafe unto him the necessary strength . . . yes, if he ly could find the faith within his own soul! . . .

He asked the assembly to keep quiet and remain seated ring the Communion service, and began the service at once. But as he started to preach the words he wanted would not me; in those that came there seemed to be no power; -day something had happened to him which he could not ntrol. He heard himself speak, and it seemed like the ice of another. He could not fathom it; here he stood be- re a remarkable congregation, under the most inspiring rcumstances; he had been given a text more wonderful an any servant of the Lord could rightly hope to find; in ways he was better prepared to conduct Communion serv- es to-day than he had ever been before. . . . And yet he uld not preach . . . the words would not come! . . .

They were failing him utterly now. Here he was preach- g about the Glory of the Lord—and stuttering like a child! . . "I must go a little slower and try to collect my thoughts; at may help me; perhaps it will bring the words I need. . . It makes no difference if I don't speak so loud, the eople can hear me well enough, if I can only express myself mply and clearly!" . . . He struggled to find the right ords, the aptest illustrations; his face grew flushed with e unusual exertion; great beads of sweat stood out on it d began to roll down. . . . But all to no purpose. . . .

. . . "If I am not careful," he thought, "I will break down mpletely; I'm not saying a thing that is worth while!" . . . nd he spoke even more slowly, making long pauses between s sentences, so that it sounded like a sort of conversation— one-sided argument against a silent adversary. . . . The an who had looked forward with such fervour to preaching this sermon on The Glory of the Lord was making a sorr mess of it as he rambled on in disconnected phrases.

But he must keep going; he had asked the people to rema seated, and they were expecting a long discourse; to disa point them would be a scandal.

. . . "The Glory of the Lord—what is it? One might sup pose it to be too wonderful for us to talk about. . . . Nothir to that remark!" he thought, as soon as he had said it. . . "Nothing but empty words about holy things!" . . .

He began to enumerate all the examples from the Scrip tures that he had been striving for two weeks to cull an arrange; everything calculated to show the real wonders o the Glory of the Lord:

. . . "Did not Adam and Eve behold the Glory of th Lord as they walked in innocence in Paradise? The Lor spake to them in the paths of the Garden; that was in th morning of time, when the world was still young and every thing in it was pure and beautiful. . . . And Enoch who wa translated that he should not see death. . . . Abraham an Sarah, as they saw the promise made to them fulfilled befor their eyes in such a wonderful fashion. . . . Jacob, wh fought with the Lord and wrestled with Him as man to ma —what was he allowed to see? . . . And that man of Goo up on Mount Sinai, as he stood face to face with the Lor of Hosts. . . . and Jonah, and all the rest?" . . . Th speaker toiled through the entire Old Testament and pushe his way into the New. . . . "What was it that the little ban of disciples experienced when they sat at table with Him an He Himself brake the bread for them and handed them th cup?"

The minister paused, wiping the perspiration from hi face. Every time he drew one of these word pictures fo them, the idea came to him more and more forcibly: "Thes people, sitting here in front of me, are Sognings and Voss ings; the man of the house and his wife are fisher-folk fro Nordland. . . . How can they understand the things tha happened to an alien people, living ages ago, in a distan land? The Israelites were an Oriental race; they didn ow anything about Dakota Territory, either; they had no perience of the hardships out here!" . . . He could have pt aloud in his sore distress; here he stood, an old and ed servant of God—and now he had preached himself ough the whole Bible without finding the Glory of the rd! . . .

. . "This will never, never do!" he thought, and contin- d doggedly to speak in slow accents, like one who goes out looking for something while he talks aloud to himself. s eyes roamed helplessly over the rows of faces; they ed on a fly buzzing around the room, and followed it ile he talked. A little way off sat a young woman with ee small children; she was a fine, bright-looking woman, nned and burned by the sun; that must be the girl that nseten had married, he thought. The oldest child leaned against her, the second lay with his head on her thigh; seemed to be sleeping, for the minister saw only the curly ad. She had the youngest child in her lap. He had been stless for a long time, and the mother had unbuttoned her thes to nurse him. The fly buzzed and buzzed, made a rn in the air, and settled on the nose of the nursing child; e mother raised her hand and swept it away, and as she d so she drew the hand caressingly over the face of the ild.

The minister kept on looking at the group. . . . He had lked himself into complete bankruptcy respecting all things eat and beautiful, without finding a message that seemed apply here. Now, taking a sudden shift, he began to ad- ess the little group directly before him; not that he actually inted to the sunburnt, healthy woman who sat there watch- g the fly, too busy to listen to him; but he commenced speak of the love of mother and child. And all at once did something that he had never done before in a Com- union sermon—he told a story; it was a sentimental story, o—and he had always despised sentimentality in preaching: Once upon a time, he said, a Norwegian immigrant woman nded in New York City; her name was Kari—she was wid- ved and had nine children. . . . New York is a terribly large city. Imagine the difficulties a poor immigrant woma meets with there—one who can neither speak nor understan the language! And this woman hadn't a single friend in a America. When she landed, and saw the great throngs o people, and looked at the whirlpool of traffic, she got terribl frightened, poor soul! She had been told that in this for eign metropolis almost anything might happen to a mothe coming alone with nine children; and so she had prepare herself in her own way. Around her waist was wound long rope; this she now unrolled, tying all nine children t it in single file, but keeping the end still securely fastene around her waist. In this fashion Kari plodded through th streets of the great city, a laughingstock to all passers-by But just the same, she reached her destination at last, wit all her nine children safe and sound! . . . Wasn't that rop a fine illustration of a mother's love?

It occurred to the minister that he had come down to ver commonplace things—yet he spoke straight out, from the ful ness of his heart. . . . The people were listening intently the woman with three little children stopped chasing the fly he longed to tell her to go on with her duties and not min him. . . . But all at once she seemed to become his ow mother, as plainly as if he had seen her in the flesh; and h remembered how she had struggled and suffered as a pionee woman, first in Illinois, afterward in Minnesota. He wa profoundly moved as he caught this reflection of her destiny his words came faster, pouring forth without a trace o effort. . . . "But when such love exists between a poor pio neer woman and her plain, ordinary children, what must i not be when it rises to Divinity—the love of Him Who is th source of love itself—of Him Who cares for all life, yea even for the worm crawling in the dust? The love of mothe and child can be only an infinitesimal part of that othe love; yet, small and imperfect as it is, it still carries a breat of the Divine omnipotence. . . . If you, pioneer mothers have not seen the Glory of the Lord, then no preacher of th Gospel will ever be able to show it to you! . . . And no come forward to the altar of God and taste that He is good

. Come, with all your sins and all your sorrows. . . .
ing Him your trials and your grief! Love itself, eternal d boundless, is present here. He is ready and willing to hten your burdens, just as a mother cares for her nursing ild. . . . Come and receive freely of the abundance of ace. Come and behold the Glory of the Lord!" . . .

The minister ended his sermon, looked at his watch, and s brows knit in a puzzled frown. How had this happened?
ccording to the watch, he had been speaking for an hour
d fifteen minutes. Could it be possible?

The people came forward, knelt down before Per Hansa's g chest, and received an assurance so gracious and benign at they could hardly credit its reality. . . . Many eyes ed with tears during that hour. . . .

The absolution took a long time. The minister looked ain at his watch; he still couldn't understand where the ne had gone. In his heart he blamed himself bitterly; not ly had he spoiled the Communion sermon, but he had also ade it so long that no time was left for the regular sermon the day!

And so he omitted the sermon altogether, brought the mmunion service to a close, and ended with a fervent monition to the communicants to go directly home and main quiet for the rest of the day. . . . They mustn't stop ywhere to gossip and talk! . . . He would return at the d of four weeks, at which time he intended to take up the estion of organizing a congregation.

He refused to stop for dinner; having hastily drunk a wl of milk, he got into his cart at once and drove off. . . .
ne cart shook and rattled; the old nag ambled along; the nister sat immersed in a deep gloom. . . . "Never before," thought, "have I failed so miserably in any service!"

VIII

It rained both Monday and Tuesday, but not so hard that ans Olsa had to stop building. With two carpenters to help n, he made such good progress that the day was gone

even before it had begun—or so it seemed to him. Whic was hardly to be wondered at, because from morning ti night could be heard rumbling out of the caverns of his bulk chest a continuous monotone that was seriously meant to be song; as steady and deliberate as everything he did—as h himself was, for that matter—the vocal performance drone and rumbled on and never came to an end; and so each da proved too short, both for himself and his song.

Yes, now Hans Olsa was building himself a real house and he sang all day at his work. And why shouldn't h sing? This was going to be a beautiful house, larger—ver much larger, in fact—than he had originally planned; it wa to have a roomy kitchen, both a dining room and a parlo with three bedrooms upstairs and two downstairs.

Concerning the matter of bedrooms on the ground floo there had been a long-drawn argument between him an Sörine; not a serious disagreement, exactly, but—well, the had talked about it a great deal! Hans Olsa was never in th habit of saying unkind things to his wife; and Sörine alway smiled, even when she was provoked; so a real quarrel be tween the two was hard to raise. But in this instance sh held tenaciously to her idea that there must be a bedroon downstairs, no matter how many others he might build else where; and that plan called for an addition to the house which seemed a needless extravagance. And it was so un like her—she was never known to be extravagant! So h had tried to reason the idea out of her head; but he finall had had to give it up as a bad job. And since there was n way out of building an addition, while he was about it, h thought, he might as well extend it clear across the house Thus it had come about that there were to be two extra bed rooms downstairs. . . . Very unwise, a needless expense and so utterly unlike her; but there stood the framework, al complete. Nothing to do about it now.

That Sörine was a real gift from on high no one knew better than Hans Olsa himself; and now, this particula summer, there was nothing that he would not gladly have done for her. Ever since last spring, when she had con

ed to him that she was with child, he had been in a state blissful anticipation—this time he felt sure that it would a boy. Hence the new house—hence the song. As soon she had told him the great news he had come to the de- ion that that event should never take place in the old sod use; and if it meant such a lot to her to get that room wnstairs, she certainly should have it, no matter how un- asonable it might be.

Hans Olsa was fully aware, these days, how everything as arranging itself for his benefit, and he walked about in state of blissful contentment and thankfulness; his herd had eadily increased from year to year; every season he got ore and more land under cultivation; there must be an end the plague some time, so all wise men said; here, where ere was not a human being to be seen the year they came, rge settlements were now springing up; the soil was good, e rain and the sunshine were plentiful. And now he was ilding a mansion for him who was coming. . . . How mar- llous it all was! . . . Hans Olsa was both a sensible and a rious-minded man; but he would gladly have built two ore rooms if she had asked for them, just to show his grati- de. . . .

He had been present at the service last Sunday, had taken rt in the Communion; and the longer the service had lasted e stronger and deeper had grown his felicity. He was only common, uneducated man, and probably lacked a proper nception of the wonders the minister preached about; yet is he knew for certain, that nothing so glorious as that mmunion service in Per Hansa's sod house had he ever fore experienced, and the happiness of that hour was still owing with steady warmth in Hans Olsa's heart. . . . As er Hansa and Beret had knelt before the chest, he had oked at them, thinking of many things. Beret's sad condi- n could easily be seen in her face. Ah no, when reason ce leaves a person, it seldom returns! . . . And Per Hansa mself had become an old man long before his time: his ir and beard were grey; his face was thin and worn; not l then had Hans Olsa fully realized the terrible struggle his lifelong friend was going through. He had gazed at the kneeling couple until his large, heavy features drooped with sympathy. Could he at that moment have shared his own happiness with his friend, he would have handed it over to him without a question.

Coming home from the service that day, he had wandered about the place, pondering over an idea which he wasn't ready to mention to his wife until he had given it more thought. But on Monday night he broached the subject to Sörine: Shouldn't they offer to take Per Hansa's youngest child? . . . Did she suppose that would be too much for her? . . . You see, he wasn't any too sure about it, himself . . . And now he told her all his thoughts of the previous Sunday. . . . What did she say—should they offer to take the child? . .

Sörine laughed and asked him teasingly if he didn't think he'd soon have enough with his own? The next instant, however, she too became serious; and now she confided in him that for a long time she had been thinking about this very same thing, herself. But she hadn't mentioned it to Per Hansa because he knew that she was only too willing; had he wanted to bring it about, he would only have had to ask her. . . .

They couldn't be sure of that, her husband objected; Per Hansa knew that she was soon going to have one of her own, and he was not the kind of a man to impose on others . . . He doubted very much, as a matter of fact, if Per Hansa fully realized the seriousness of Beret's condition. Should the plague return this summer and that awful spell come over her again, there was no telling what might happen . . . "Isn't it really up to us, who can see the true state of affairs?"

Sörine gave an unexpected answer to this question: "I believe that Beret is jealous of me because I'm so fond of her little boy. . . . I think I've noticed it."

Hans Olsa pondered this information awhile. . . . Perhaps his wife was right; and there were other difficulties, too . . . Suppose they did take the boy. Could they be certain at he would thrive better here? And if he didn't, where ould be the gain? . . . And would it be fair to the parents en to suggest such a thing? . . . At any rate, if things came such a pass that Per Hansa had to send Beret away—which asn't at all improbable—then some one would have to take e child permanently. . . . And just now, wouldn't it be too eat a burden for Sörine? . . . No, Hans Olsa couldn't ite see his way clear. . . .

Sörine only laughed at him. . . . Certainly she would undertake to be a mother to that blessed dear little boy—it ould be only one more—that is, if it ever seemed necessary. ut she doubted very much if Per Hansa would consent the plan; he thought more of that boy than of any of her children, unless she was much mistaken. . . . They discussed the matter at great length that evening.

IX

Wednesday afternoon of the same week a faint mist floated efore the sun. A light, warm rain fell at intervals from ifting shreds of clouds. Between showers the sun peeped rough the clouds to see what was going on down on the airie; and he set the rainbow here and there as a sign that e was well pleased. There was a big blue heaven behind it l, the air very still . . . beautiful weather.

Beret sat in the old sod barn which Per Hansa long since ad made over into a workshop and storehouse, sewing a irt for little Permand. The door was open and she sat here she could look out. She had sent And-Ongen to the eld with some water for the boys, who were hoeing the otatoes. Per Hansa was repairing the roof of the new barn. had been leaking there since the frost went out of the round last spring, because the willow poles used for supports had not been heavy enough. She could not see him om where she sat, but she could hear him working.

"Yes," she sighed, looking up from her sewing, "he can anage his work all right. I only wish I could do mine as ell." . . . Her face carried the same childlike expression that the minister had noticed, her eyes had the same dreamy far-away stare; they seemed to be seeing something she did not want to behold, looking for something that would never happen; hence the strange sadness that always shone through them.

She felt perfectly happy, however, but felt so tired and drowsy; it had been this way every day now since that remarkable man had placed his hand on her and in his prophetic voice had assured her that from this time forth she was released from the bonds of Satan. . . . That any man could have such power! . . . Yet she knew positively now that he hadn't been deceiving her, because burden after burden had been lifted from her soul—she felt so light that she could almost float in the air. . . . But after a while this drowsiness had come on. She could not imagine what ailed her; she slept well at night, and yet was so sleepy during the day that it was a constant struggle to keep awake; to-day she had lain down right after eating and had fallen asleep immediately.

. . . A blessed man he was, indeed. . . . And the way he had got them to sing! She had to smile as she remembered it. . . . Just imagine! he had made them sing exactly the same hymns here in this sod house as the people sang in the churches in Norway—yet no harm had befallen the house on that account. . . . Melodies were yet hanging throughout the room; yesterday while at work she had heard them everywhere. She had even caught one up and followed it—had sung until Per Hansa came rushing in, to ask her what was the matter; he had looked at her so queerly . . . He ought not to get frightened just because she sang!

As she recalled the incident now, snatches of the song came back to her again, and she began humming. . . . No, no—this would never do! She might scare some one again—people seemed so easily frightened here. . . . This had turned out to be a rather hard piece of sewing, but the child was going to look fine in his new shirt. . . . Would she be able to hear him in the other hut when he woke up? . . . Well, he had a pretty good voice! . . .

. . . Surely, now, mother will stop asking for him when e hears he is going to be a minister! . . . The smile on r childlike face broadened and lighted up. . . . A minister the family—I, the mother of a servant of God—why, that exactly as it is in the Bible! . . . Her hands trembled stitch followed stitch. But thoughts were crowding rapidly her now; she laid down her sewing.

. . . When mother comes—and she can be expected at any ne now—I shall tell her all that has happened here lately.
nd then I shall say: "You would never have become the randmother of a minister if I had remained in Norway.
uch miracles do not happen there." . . . But very likely e'll not believe what I tell her. . . . Beret's expression be-me thoughtful and troubled; she rested her hands idly in r lap. . . . Then I must tell her that now we have a urch, right here in our house. At that she'll only laugh
d shake her head, and she'll probably say: "Now, Beret, u don't know what you are talking about!" That's just hat she'll say. . . . But I will have to answer: "Now, other, I certainly do. Listen to me: We have a real church.
here is an altar with candles on it, and the altar is father's g chest!" . . . That will astonish her still more. . . .
Beret, my child," she'll say, "you are too foolish—you must ard your speech. One doesn't say everything that comes to one's head, you know!" . . . But then I'll show her w Syvert and Kjersti, Hans Olsa and Sörine and all the st, knelt down before the chest and there partook of the lory of the Lord. I shall describe it all. . . . She knows ans Olsa and Sörine—she will believe them. . . . I must ow her just where the chest stood. . . . Let me see if I can member the exact words he used:—"the gracious forgive-ss of all thy sins." . . . Yes, he said all . . . all . . . I am re of that . . . I remember it distinctly. . . .

For some time Beret sat deeply absorbed in her thoughts,
r sewing in her lap, her hands resting on it without motion.
. . Mother will sit by the stove, just as she always has done nen she has been here. "Well," she'll ask, "are you sure w, Beret, that he is going to be a minister? Don't draw hasty conclusions—you've always been so impulsive!" That exactly what she'll say. . . . Then I must answer "Yes, mother, you needn't doubt it any longer; for I myself sat here and heard how this wonderful man argued about with the Lord—and how he got his way, too. And both Per Hansa and Sörine heard it also. You can ask them if you don't believe me." . . . Then mother will look at me in her kind way, for a long, long time. At last she'll say "Well, if God can use him, it certainly isn't proper for me to want him; though I would like to have some one of your with me. But now you must take good care of him, my child!" . . . "Yes, mother, how can I help it? How can ever forget that he is to go out into the world to give of the Glory of the Lord to the children of men?" . . . Then mother will get up to go. . . . I must say to her: "Don't forget to greet father! You might just as well tell him all this, about his big chest." . . .

Beret's face had gradually grown very serious. But the sound of heavy steps in the yard brought her out of her reveries. Some one stopped at the barn, and then went in; in a moment she heard the voice of Per Hansa. . . . What can they want of him now? . . . Hm, hm—it's Per Hansa this, and Per Hansa that! First one comes and takes him away, and then another; they never leave him a minute in peace! Can't they understand that I need him at home? . . . And he is so easily talked around—he can't say no to anyone. . . . I suppose it's some more hauling—and then he'll be gone for a long time. . . .

She picked up her work again, but the sewing failed to claim her attention. . . . It took a long while over that errand. Who could it be?

Putting the work away, Beret stepped quickly out of the door, stealthily crossed the yard to the side of the new barn and pressed herself close to the wall. . . . Oh, this was Hans Olsa! It was all right, then—he certainly didn't need any more hauling.

She was straightening up to return, when something arrested her—kind words spoken slowly in a deep voice. . .

sh! hush! They ought not to talk that way about her en she was listening!

. . "Should Beret get another spell, you know what ht happen—a calamity none of us could get over. We've seen enough of such things. . . . Now, we will take the and care for him as though he were our own flesh and od. . . . Sörrina and I have talked it over."

Beret's childlike features suddenly took on a peculiarly ert expression. . . . Ah-ha! So that's his errand? . . .
sh! Hush! There is Per Hansa speaking! . . . His ce sounds so queer—can he have been frightened
in? . . .

. . "That's more than good of you and Sörrina—I real-it all; but matters will have to take their own course. . . .
e is the mother, and I can see how she clings to him. . . .
is spring I worried a lot about what I ought to do when nmer came; but now I've decided that she shall keep the ld with her. If she doesn't get well by having him at me, it certainly won't make things any easier for her to ve him away—that I know. . . . She risked her life for n once, and she shall not be bereft of the happiness of ving him with her now, no matter what happens. . . .
ere's a Destiny that rules us all—it's bound to overtake us, ether we are here or there."

. . "Now I'm afraid you are taking too great a responsity upon yourself," said the other voice, slowly. "Rememwhat might have happened last summer when she had spell."

A short silence fell in the barn. Beret's features grew se. Bending over with a quick, fierce movement, she tched up a piece of stake and grasped it tightly.

. . "No," came Per Hansa's voice in meditative tones, at's just what none of us can say for certain. She might ve escaped the attack altogether if the child had been at me. . . . I remember how pitiably she seemed to miss him.
n not at all sure that isn't what brought on the spell. Pers that burden, added to everything else, became too much her. . . . And even if the spell had come on with him here at home, she might not have harmed him—I doubt very much. . . ."

As Beret drank in these words the tenseness all left he the weapon she had seized dropped from her hand; her bo straightened up; she looked about in wide-eyed wonder. . . Were those church bells she heard? . . . But the voices we beginning again on the other side of the wall. . . . Hus Hush!

. . . "Do you really think so?" asked Hans Olsa, seriousl

. . . "Well, I tell you, Hans Olsa, there's hardly an ang to this affair that I have not considered. I'm thinking c nothing else, when I'm asleep as well as when I'm awak And this I do know," he added with great certainty, "that kinder person than Beret the Lord never made; there's noth ing but kindness in her. . . . I've come to the conclusion tha even in her beclouded moments she has meant no harm t the child—no matter how things may have looked to us. . . When all is said and done, it's my own fault from beginnin to end."

"O God! How beautiful these bells ring!" thought Bere

. . . "Because," Per Hansa went on, sadly, "I shoul not have coaxed and persuaded her to come with me out here . . . Perhaps it was her misfortune that we two ever met . . . You remember how it was in Nordland: We had boat that we sailed to Lofoten in, big crafts that could stand al kinds of rough weather, if properly handled; and then ther were the small boats that we used for the home fishing; th last were just as fine and just as good for their own purpose as the other kind for theirs, but you couldn't exchange them you couldn't sail to Lofoten with the small boats, nor fish a home in the larger ones. . . . For you and me, life out her is nothing; but there may be others so constructed that the don't fit into this life at all; and yet they are finer and bette souls than either one of us. . . . There are so many thing we don't comprehend."

. . . "I certainly ought to know Beret," remarked th other voice, thoughtfully. "We were playmates, she an I." . . .

. . "I doubt that very much," interrupted Per Hansa, ough you are an observing man. I have lived with her hese years, yet I must confess that I don't know her. . . . e is a better soul than any I've ever met. It's only lately t I have begun to realize all she has suffered since we came here. The minister was probably right; no one can ever nom the depths of a mother's heart. . . . The urge within drove me on and on, and never would I stop; for I soned like this, that where I found happiness others must d it as well. . . . But you see how things have turned out! . The finest castle on earth I was going to build her— d here we're still living in a mole's hole—all my dreams ve been crushed in misery. . . . But this I've decided, that shall keep the baby—though I thank you for the offer." . The sadness in Per Hansa's voice had grown deeper and re profound than the grey autumn evening that falls on bleak prairie.

. . "You mustn't feel hurt about the offer," put in the w voice of Hans Olsa. "We only thought it might do a le good."

Beret listened no more; she walked away like one in a am of happiness; she did not know where she was going what she did. In the southern sky floated transparent le clouds; rainbow ribbons hung down from them. She v the rainbow's glow; her face was transfigured; she lked on in ecstasy. . . . "Are there signs for us in the ? . . . That is the Glory of the Lord now . . . See! . . . e whole heavens are full of it! . . . There . . . and there in . . . everywhere!"

She reached the other house, came to the door, and would ve gone by, but in the house a child was crying loudly. ret stopped short and passed her hand across her face, as trying to wake herself from a dream that possessed her; n she went quickly into the house. Over on the bed sat rmand, crying as though his heart would break. Beret rried to the bed, threw herself down on it, took the boy in arms, and hugged him close; she felt as if she had got k a child that had been irretrievably lost; she wept as she fondled him, while wave upon wave of gratitude well up within her.

The boy was so astonished at his mother's strange b haviour that he stopped crying immediately and lay quiet; th he wriggled out of her arms and threw himself on the pillo one of his forefingers in his mouth, the other pointing o into the air, as children often will do when they don't kn whether to laugh or cry. There was something so irresistib comical about him as he lay there pointing at nothing, that sudden surge of playfulness swept over her and she thre herself down beside him on the pillow. Then he gave her h very biggest smile, letting the finger that had been hoverir in the air fall on her face. At that they both burst out laug ing—she so boisterously that he withdrew the finger ar gave her a frown. She stopped laughing at once, petting ar fondling him until she had won him completely.

X

As Beret lay there playing with the child she was sudden overcome with drowsiness; it seemed to her that she simp could not resist snatching a little sleep—it would feel so del cious! In a moment she had dozed off and was carrie away into an infinite, glittering blue space with rainbow hung all around it. The air felt soft and warm about he A voice, loud and clear, yet very beautiful, was speakin through the sky. . . . She could not have slept long, fo when she awoke there sat the boy close by her side, pokin a wet finger into her eyelid. She hastily raised up on on elbow and rubbed her eyes, unable to bring herself full awake. . . . "My, how I must have slept!" she thought. . . She gazed wide-eyed at the child beside her, and rubbed he eyes again, but could not seem to be able to connect thing in her mind. . . . "Why, what am I thinking about?" sh said, half amused. "This is my own little Permand!"

She sat up on the edge of the bed, lifted the boy tenderl and put him down in her lap. To her own surprise, she wa trembling in every limb; she felt a sudden overwhelmin shfulness, like a lover who for the first time comes close his beloved.

"I want something to eat now!" murmured the boy in a ce that was full of well-being.

—Of course, this little fellow needs food! she thought.

The boy wriggled out of her arms and slid down to the or. . . . She could hardly take her eyes away from him; e began to feel almost frightened because of all the vigor- s life in that sound little body.

She hastily left the bed and started to find something for e child to eat. It was in her mind to get some milk from shelf in the corner; but instead of going there she re- ained standing in the middle of the floor, looking about the om, her eyes still large with wonder. . . . Everything oked so strange in here to-day! What could have hap- ned? It seemed to her that she hadn't been here for a ng time. . . . The child was growing impatient; he took ld of her skirt, shook it, and wanted her to hurry. . . . It nfused her dreadfully to stand here like a stranger in her vn house! . . . Well, anyway, there was the bowl of milk e had been looking for. . . . Where was the spoon, now, at she always used for skimming? . . . And used she not have a special cup for the child? . . . And the bread—he d to have a slice of bread with his milk! . . . Where was e bread always kept in this house? . . .

Beret went searching about in her own home like a house- fe who had been away on a long visit and returns a partial ranger. But the feeling of home-coming filled her with ch joy, that she could only laugh at her bewilderment. . . . ne found one thing here, another there; at last the boy had ten his fill and was satisfied.

All at once another thought struck her; she glanced around ith puzzled anxiety. . . . Where were the rest of the fam- to-day? . . . Surely Per Hansa was somewhere around. adn't she just been talking to him? . . . And where could e children be keeping themselves? . . . It exasperated her, t she couldn't help laughing; here they had all been with r only a moment ago, and now she couldn't recall the least little thing! Was she walking in her sleep, in broad day light? . . . Thinking vaguely that she must try to get things cleared up, she went out of the door and looked around.

The mildness of the afternoon greeted her like a friend. She breathed in the pure air deeply, straightening her body, throwing back her arms. . . . What fine weather, these days! . . . The trees around the yard caught her eye; again she had the feeling of having just returned from a long journey. The idea! Look how big that grove is getting to be. . . . Over on the prairie, some distance away, rose a half-finished house. Well, that's Hans Olsa's. It will be fine for Sörrina to move into that new house! No matter how good care you take of a sod house, it's never very satisfactory—dust and dirt keep falling from the ceiling all the time, especially when it gets old. . . . But who was that tall, stooping man coming out of the barn? Now he had greeted her quietly in a deep voice and walked on. . . . Beret began to be worried. Wasn't that Hans Olsa? Didn't she know her own neighbour? . . . Hearing some one still in the barn, she hurried across the yard and peered in.

"Are you in there?" she called.

A stocky, broad-shouldered man appeared in the barn door; his face was deeply furrowed; his hair and beard, heavily sprinkled with grey, were now full of dust and straw. As she looked at him she felt strangely uneasy and disturbed; but she couldn't help giving him a bright smile.

"What in the world has happened to you, Per Hansa?"

He stood staring fixedly at her, unable to stir a muscle. No power on earth could have taken his eyes away from her face at that moment; he caught hold of the jamb of the door to steady himself. . . . God in heaven!—what had happened? . . .

Beret saw his great agitation. Now her disturbance increased—her concern over him grew genuine. "Are you sick, Per Hansa?" she asked in tones of deepest sympathy, coming closer to him. "You mustn't keep on with this work when you aren't feeling well; there can't be such a hurry about it, you know."

Per Hansa cleared his throat to speak, but no words came
. he could only look at her.
She noticed his pale, haggard face, and her anxiety grew stent. "You've got to quit right now! . . . I'll run in l boil some milk for you!" . . . She hurried off to the ıse, too full of her new-found solicitude to wait for an wer.
n the open door Per Hansa stood gazing at her as she nt; he longed to follow her, to touch her, to talk to her, he dared not do it. . . . There was a spade standing bee the door; he picked it up and set it down inside. . . .
"No, it better not stand in here." He picked it up again l put it back. . . . His eyes rested on a hammer lying on floor—the one he had been using a moment ago. "I must ıember to put that hammer away before it gets tramped
o the ground." . . . Next moment he forgot all about it.
. He was shaking violently from head to foot; he had lean up against the wall. . . . "God be merciful! I ven't seen her like this for many years!" . . . Then he hed wearily. . . . "But I don't suppose it means any-ng."
Beret came into the house, moving with purpose and confi-ıce now, and hurried to light the fire. The boy was still ing at the table; no sooner did he see her than he wanted re to eat. But she had no time to bother with him; she a pan on the stove and filled it with milk. . . . "Poor low, he must have caught a cold, in all this rainy weather," thought. "And summer colds are hard to get rid of, less they're taken in time. I'd better mix some pepper
h the milk. . . . If I could only persuade him to lie down that I'd have a chance to cover him up and get him good l warm, I'd soon have him all right again. . . . Colds n't usually last very long with him."
As she was tidying up the bed she chanced to get a glimpse herself in the mirror that hung on the wall behind it; she l to take a second look. . . . "Good gracious! What a ht I am to-day! No wonder he looked worried—he who ays wants me so nice!" . . . While she was waiting for the milk to simmer, she washed her face and combed h hair; that done, she opened the big chest, found her b Sunday garments, and hurriedly put them on. . . . N then, she wasn't quite so much of a scarecrow. . . .

The milk boiled; she lifted it off the stove, went to t door, and called Per Hansa. . . . As a timid child enters stranger's house and does not dare to put aside his cap, now Per Hansa stepped across his own threshold. Perma was still sitting by the table; his father caught sight of hi there, and walking over to him, picked the boy up and s down in his stead; then he put him on his lap and gent stroked his hair. . . . His voice was gone—it would n come. . . . All the while he was casting furtive glances his wife; big beads of sweat stood on his forehead.

She brought him a cup of the steaming milk. "I put pe per in it; now you must get it down while it's still hot. . . Then you shall go right to bed and get good and warm!"

Without protest he did as she bade him, sipping cup aft cup of the strong hot mixture; he couldn't keep his eyes o her face. . . . But still he found no words to say to he whenever he tried to speak his throat closed. . . .

While he was drinking she came and sat down by his sid telling him innocently how topsy-turvy things had seemed t her to-day. Why, she had just lain down for a moment wit the child, and when she woke up it had seemed as though sh had been gone for years and a day! She laughed merrily a she told him about it.

Per Hansa listened in silence, looked at her, and drank the hot mixture until the tears rolled down his cheeks. . . She chatted on unconsciously, her voice low but full and ver sweet; as he gazed at her, he saw in her face only intelligen concern—only loving solicitude—exactly like the dear Bere girl that he used to know! . . . When he found it impossib to swallow another drop of the hot pepper-and-milk, sh insisted that he lie down at once; if he would only take good sweat, this cold would soon pass off. Per Hansa obeye like a docile child, while she herself came and tucked th

t around him. . . . "Now try to drop off to sleep. . . .
n't worry—you'll soon be all right."

He turned his face to the wall, crying silently; he had ped his hands together with a grip of iron, but soon he to break the grip, to wipe the tears away. . . .

He lay thus until the paroxysm had passed and he felt t he could master himself. Then he flung the covers le, sat up suddenly on the edge of the bed, and looked ently at Beret, long and slow. . . . He began to believe
. and as he looked, he felt his old self returning. . . .

Are you getting up already?" she asked, greatly sursed. "I really think you ought to stay in bed the rest of day."

"Oh, well . . . !" He laughed boisterously, rose to his t, and stretched himself. "I guess I'd better hurry up l get that rickety roof fixed. . . . We must begin building e as soon as Hans Olsa can find time to help with the ling! . . . By God, we're not going to live like moles all days! . . . That drink of yours was pretty good. Have u got a drop left?" He came forward and began pacing and down the room. . . . "God!" . . . But then he ecked himself in time, caught Permand in his arms, and ng him up to the ceiling again and again, until the boy ieked with delight.

"My, my, how funny we all are to-day!" smiled Beret as e stood there with the bowl in her hands, waiting for them come to their senses.

IV. The Great Plain Drinks the Blood o Christian Men and Is Satisfied

I

MANY and incredible are the tales the grandfathe tell from those days when the wilderness was y untamed, and when they, unwittingly, founded th Kingdom. There was the Red Son of the Great Prairi who hated the Palefaces with a hot hatred; stealthily h swooped down upon them, tore up and laid waste the littl settlements. Great was the terror he spread; bloody the sag concerning him.

But more to be dreaded than this tribulation was th strange spell of sadness which the unbroken solitude cas upon the minds of some. Many took their own lives; asylur after asylum was filled with disordered beings who had onc been human. It is hard for the eye to wander from sky lin to sky line, year in and year out, without finding a restin place! . . .

Then, too, there were the years of pestilence—toil an travail, famine and disease. God knows how human being could endure it all. And many did not—they lay down an died. "There is nothing to do about that," said they wh survived. "We are all destined to die—that's certain. Som must go now; others will have to go later. It's all the same is it not?" The poor could find much wherewith to consol themselves. And whisky was cheap in those days, and eas to get. . . .

And on the hot summer days terrible storms might come In the twinkling of an eye they would smash to splinter the habitations which man had built for himself, so that the resembled nothing so much as a few stray hairs on a worn

: pelt. Man have power? Breathe it not, for that is to ıpt the Almighty! . . .

Some feared most the prairie fire. Terrible, too, it was, ore people had learned how to guard against it.

Others remembered best the trips to town. They were the liest days, said some; no, they were the worst of all, said : others. It may be that both were right. . . . The oxen ved slowly—whether the distance was thirty miles or ıety made little difference. In the sod house back there, newhere along the horizon, life got on your nerves at ıes. There sat a wife with a flock of starving children; e had grown very pale of late, and the mouths of the chil-en were always open—always crying for food. . . . But in e town it was cheerful and pleasant. There one could get drink; there one could talk with people who spoke with thusiasm and certainty about the future. This was the ıd of promise, they said. Sometimes one met these people the saloons; and then it was more fascinating to listen to em than to any talk about the millennium. Their words ' like embers in the mind during the whole of the intermi-ble, jolting journey homeward, and made it less long. . . . helps so much to have something pleasant to think about, y the Old.

And it was as if nothing affected people in those days. ıey threw themselves blindly into the Impossible, and ac-mplished the Unbelievable. If anyone succumbed in the uggle—and that happened often—another would come and ke his place. Youth was in the race; the unknown, the tried, the unheard-of, was in the air; people caught it, were oxicated by it, threw themselves away, and laughed at e cost. Of course it was possible—everything was possible t here. There was no such thing as the Impossible any ore. The human race has not known such faith and such f-confidence since history began. . . . And so had been e Spirit since the day the first settlers landed on the eastern ores; it would rise and fall at intervals, would swell and rge on again with every new wave of settlers that rolled stward into the unbroken solitude.

II

They say it rained forty days and forty nights once in th old days, and that was terrible; but during the winter o 1880-81 it snowed twice forty days; that was more terribl . . . Day and night the snow fell. From the 15th of Octo ber, when it began, until after the middle of April, it seldor ceased. From the four corners of the earth it flew; bu of all the winds that brought it, the south wind was th worst; for that whisked and matted the flakes into huge gre discs, which fell to the ground in clinging, woolly folds. . . And all winter the sun stayed in his house; he crept ou only now and then to pack down the snow; that was to mak room for more. . . . Morning after morning folk woul wake up in the dead, heavy cold, and would lie in bed listen ing to the ooo-h-ooo-h-ooo-h-ing of the wind about the cor ners of the house. But what was this low, muffled roar i the chimney? One would leap out of bed, dress himself hur riedly in his heaviest garments, and start to go out—only t find that some one was holding the door. It wouldn't budg an inch. An immovable monster lay close outside. Agains this monster one pushed and pushed, until one could scoop little of the snow through the crack into the room; finally on was able to force an opening large enough for a man t work himself out and flounder up to the air. Once outside he found himself standing in an immense flour bin, out o which whirled the whiteness, a solid cloud. Then he had t dig his way down to the house again. And tunnels had t be burrowed from house to barn, and from neighbour t neighbour, wherever the distances were not too long an where there were children who liked to play at such things.

In the late spring, when all this snow had to thaw, th floods would come, covering all the land. Once again i would be just as it had been in the days of Noah; on th roofs of houses, on the gables of barns, in wagon boxes, ever people would go sailing away. Many would perish—fo there was no Ark in those days! . . .

The suffering was great that winter. Famine came; sup

s of all kinds gave out; for no one had thought, when the t snowfall began, that winter had come. Who had ever rd of its setting in in the middle of the autumn? . . . H for a while not much snow did come; the fall was light November, though the days were grey and chill; in Decem- there was more; January began to pile and drift it up; in February the very demon himself arrived. Some had eave their potatoes in the ground; others could not thresh grain; fuel, if not provided beforehand, was scarcely to had at all; and it was impossible for anyone to get ough to town to fetch what might be needed.

n the houses round about folks were grinding away at ir own wheat; for little by little the flour had given out, l then they had to resort to the coffee mill. Everyone ne to it—rich and poor alike. Those who had no mill of ir own were forced to borrow; in some neighbourhoods re were as many as four families using one mill.

That winter Torkel Tallaksen had two newcomer boys rking for their board; he also kept a hired girl; in addi- n to these he had a big family of his own, so that his pply of flour was soon exhausted. Now, he owned one l, but he wasn't satisfied with that, so he went and bor- ved four more; one might as well grind enough to last a time while one was at it, ne maintained. And so they ound away at his house for two days; but at the end of t time they were all so tired of it that they refused to nd any more.

When the mills had to be returned one of the little Tallak- boys put on his skis and started off for Tönseten's with one they had borrowed there. The slight thaw of the before and the frost of the previous night had left a rd crust on the snow; in some places this would bear him but more often it was so thin that he broke through. wn by the creek the snowdrifts lay like mountains. Here boy let himself go, gathered more speed than he had ex- ted to, and went head over heels into a huge snowdrift. s skis flew one way, the mill another. When he tried to over the mill he broke through the drift, and then both he and the mill were buried in snow. He dug himself ou began to hunt wildly for the mill, broke through agai floundered around, and at last managed to lose the mill cor pletely. After hunting until he was tired, he had to give up; there was nothing to do but to go to Tönseten and t him what had happened.

"You haven't lost the mill?" gasped Tönseten, serious alarmed.

"No," said the boy, laughing. He knew exactly where was, but he just couldn't find it.

"And you laugh at that, you young idiot!" Tönseten w so angry that he boxed the boy's ears; then he pulled on h coat and rushed off to ask his neighbours to help him hu for the lost treasure. It was on this occasion that he coin a saying that later became a by-word in the settlement- "Never mind your lives, boys, if you can only find the mill

But the greatest hardship of all for the settlers was t scarcity of fuel—no wood, no coal. In every home peop sat twisting fagots of hay with which to feed the fire.

Whole herds of cattle were smothered in the snow. Th disappeared during the great early storm in October, a were never seen again; when the snow was gone in t spring, they would reappear low on some hillside. Aft lying there for six months, they would be a horrible sight.

And the same thing happened to people: some disappear like the cattle; others fell ill with the cough; people died nee lessly, for want of a doctor's care; they did not even have t old household remedies—nothing of any kind. And wh some one died, he was laid out in what the family could spar and put away in a snowbank—until some later day. . . There would be many burials in the settlement next sprin

III

The third quarter-section which Hans Olsa owned lay ne the creek, north of Solums'. This he had fenced in and w using as a pasture for a large herd. During the summer did not need to look after the cattle at all, except to give the

; the grass was plentiful up north and they could drink he creek. The preceding year the herd had pastured e until late in the fall. This year he had hauled over all straw he could spare, and had bought more where he ld find it. Then he had built a shed of poles and banked n with the straw, with the intention of wintering the cattle that quarter. He had finished the shed before winter set and now that he had managed to keep the cattle there il February, he felt fairly safe; surely the winter would over pretty soon. . . . But the winter had only begun!
The 7th of February dawned bleak and cold. Large, sled snowflakes came flying out of the west, filling the ole sky with a grey, woolly blanket. As the wind stiffened dily throughout the morning, the flakes grew smaller and r; but for all that, they fell in a thicker cloud. By noon, ven and earth were a swirl of drifting snow. The west d cut in more and more savagely; it waxed to a fury at es, driving the snowflakes before it with such violence they were pinned to the walls. . . . As the afternoon
e on, the weather became so bad that Hans Olsa thought est to go over north and look after the cattle. Had he been so familiar with the lay of the land, or had he not wn how to take his bearings by the direction of the wind, would never have been able to find the place.
Things were in pretty bad shape there. Most of the straw been blown away from the west side of the shed. The le had left the open inclosure, and had sought what lter they could find to leeward of the straw stacks on the th side. At a glance he saw that unless he could repair shed at once and get the animals under some sort of proion, he would find himself a considerably poorer man on morrow. So he set to work as hard as he could carry w and fill it in between the poles, in order to shut out the d; that done, he spread more straw all over the floor.
t was dark by the time he had got the shed into fit condi-to drive the cattle in again. In the meanwhile they had n standing behind the stacks. But now his trouble began arnest; the moment he drove the beasts far enough away from their shelter to feel the full force of the wind, th wheeled sharply, put their noses close to the ground, a headed back for the stacks. This would never do! He wait awhile until they were quiet again, and then he led them ov one by one, taking the biggest first; the smaller animals literally picked up and carried in. These had burrow themselves so far into the stack that it was difficult even get them out. With the snow beating on him, and the wi constantly taking his breath away, he found this a tough jo but he kept on at it without pause, though the sweat w pouring from him in streams.

The evening was gone when he had finished. Round abo him lay the night, full of a whirling menace thicker, mo desperate, than he had ever seen before—a surge which t wind drove before it in roaring breakers; in the eddies arou the corners it was impossible to keep one's eyes open. . Hans Olsa stood at the door of the shed, his work do looking out at the storm; he was so weary that every lir trembled. At last he started out mechanically, walked a fe steps, but had to stop to catch his breath. Then he beg to realize that in this darkness, with such a blizzard ragi he would never be able to steer a straight course home. I felt his way back to the shed, went in again, and remain standing in the door. . . . His mind was too exhausted think clearly; something kept telling him that he had do well to save the cattle. If they had been left outside, the wouldn't have been many of them alive when the storm w over. If they only had a little more straw under them, th would really be quite comfortable now.

After he had been standing there a short while a succe sion of slight shivers began to run through his body. I wasn't exactly cold—it was only that his muscles would keep quiet. Now they tautened and cramped convulsivel now they arched and slacked up like released steel spring . . . "If I lie down close to the animals, I'll easily be a to keep warm," he thought. "Day will soon come, and th I can go home to Sörrina and the children. I suppose she re sense enough to go to bed and not sit up to wait for all night."

He felt his way over to where the herd had snuggled together, and lay down with his back close up against a large l. He recognized the animal by a broken horn which his nd happened to fall on. His underclothes were so wet that y stuck to his body; but the warmth of the bull soon penetted to him, and then he felt better. He lay there thinking w fine it was that he had saved the herd. About hurrying ne he needn't worry, for all was well there. . . .

He did not intend to go to sleep—wasn't aware that he s dropping off, either. He merely felt a heavy drowsiss stealing over him, and surrendered himself to it for a ment. It seemed so restful after that strenuous labor. hind him rose the sound of quiet, regular breathing—up . down; up . . . down—like a light undertow on a sumr's day. If only he could have such pleasant warmth in ont of him, too! Involuntarily he stretched out his arms, ught hold of the first creature he came to, and raised himf up sufficiently to drag it close to him. Fearing that he ght have hurt the poor thing, he began to pet it and talk it. . . . Really, now, he was as comfortable as a man could pect to be on such a night—anywhere but at home. Hans sa settled back and curled himself up snugly between the mals.

The gusts of wind shook and tore at the frail shelter. The rm raged terribly; all evil powers were loose that night. e worst of it was that it had turned so bitterly cold. rough every crack in the shed the snow came whirling; it tled everywhere, piling itself up in little mounds, which e wind alternately levelled and raised again, as it sucked d swirled through the place. . . . Hans Olsa began to itch violently; he thought that he felt some one pricking arms and legs. Next instant he knew there must be somedy there—somebody who was using both hands on him; e hand was working upward from the legs; the other from e elbow toward the shoulder. When these two hands met, jumped—a shock seemed to go over him. . . . With great difficulty he heaved himself up and stood on his knees; th heavy mantle of snow slipped off him, shedding an ic shower which struck him full in the face. . . . Now, wh was this—had he lost his feet? . . . And where were h hands? . . . With infinite pains he raised himself and stoo unsteadily on his legs. Then he tried to go to the door, look at the weather; but in a moment he was down again; the first step he had stumbled against a living mound undo the snow, which reared up wildly and then was gone in th impenetrable darkness. With each movement now, a bla of wind and snow struck his face. This happened man times.

He could not understand it—what had happened to him He knew that he wasn't drunk, but his legs would not carr him. And one of his arms was gone. . . . Well, here wa the wall. He leaned against it, and stood there, pantin . . . What! Was his hand frozen? . . . He pulled the mi ten off his good hand, took hold of the fingers of the othe and bent them—yet he could not feel them move. He sa them bend, too—but he could not feel them. . . . This woul have to be attended to at once! He let himself sink dow and began to rub the hand with snow—he breathed on i hard, and rubbed. Now he began to feel himself froze through and through; his teeth were chattering; his whol body was shaking violently; well, there was no time to wast in idle thinking. . . .

Even now he was trying to make the best of it. "As soo as this hand is all right, I'll have to get my feet thawed ou If I don't get that done, I'll be a cripple for life." . . . I his usual level-headed way, he tried to pull his boots off, bu couldn't accomplish it. Then he took out his pocket knif and ripped them both open—first one, then the other, an placed them methodically against the wall. The socks cam off easily enough; these he stuck in the bosom of his shir

He got up and started to run in his bare feet, holding t the wall; he stumbled a good deal, but kept on with hi shambling run. After a spell of this, he sat down and chafe his feet. He rubbed a long while, got up again and ran—ra nard as he could, and then sat down again to rub anew. mind was calm, but it worked very slowly—his thoughts ned to be far away; he saw them in bright letters against darkness: "I had better be careful—I've often seen ple rub the skin from a frozen limb. . . . If I only had ie cold water, this would be easy." . . . He pulled his ks on again, and found his boots. In one corner of the d, he remembered, stood two crotches, which he had nd together with steel wire. He felt his way there, untened the wire, and wound it around his bootlegs.

Then he began to stamp up and down along the wall . . . beat his arms . . . to run. The pricking seemed to be ng away, he thought . . . everything seemed better . . . he wasn't certain of anything at all. His thoughts were rking somewhere outside himself; they stood and stared at n through the whirling drift. . . . "It is certain," said nething away there in the dark, "that if you stay here toht, you're done for. . . . If the wind continues steady, u ought to be able to find Henry's fence—you know where t takes off in the direction of Per Hansa's—you follow rom there on, and then you come to your own—that runs ht to the cattle barn at home. You might as well freeze to th out there, as here." . . . "Well, well," he assented, as tired of arguing. "That may be right—it may be." . . . lling himself together, he went out of the shed and started before the wind. . . .

IV

That night Hans Olsa received his death blow. He mbled into his own house in the small hours of the morn; he was then so exhausted that he could not get his thes off unaided. . . . Sörine had been up all night, wellh crazed with fear; twice she had started to go to Per nsa's for help, but the storm had driven her back each e; then she had lighted a candle and placed it in the ndow, in hopes of its doing some good. She had fed the with desperate resolution, trying to face the fact that now the worst had happened and there was nothing to d about it, for Fate is inexorable.

As soon as she had got him into the house she began ten ing him with frantic haste. She made him drink sever bowls of hot milk with black pepper in it; then she put hi to bed, warmed the clothes and tucked them around hi But he lay there shivering, in spite of all she did, so that t whole bed shook. Later in the day he began to cough—a dr rasping cough, it was, that seemed to grate on something ha as iron down in the bottom of his chest. During the nig that followed he was delirious; he wanted to get up all t time and go north to look after the cattle. Sörine had a she could do to quiet him and keep him in bed. When t cough came from deep down in his lungs it seemed to scra off flecks of rust that stuck in his throat and threatened t choke him.

Day came at last, after a long, dismal night; and then h seemed better. Between the coughing spells he talked calm to his wife, telling her what she and Sofie had to do about t chores. He felt condemned that they should be left to do a the outside work alone. As soon as they had gone out, h tried to get out of bed and put on his clothes; but the chil grew so violent that he could not stand on his feet. He fe back on the bed. . . .

For two full days the blizzard raged. During the for noon of the third day the snow ceased falling and the stor abated; but the air was still grey and bitterly cold. As soo as Hans Olsa saw that the storm was really letting up, h told Sofie to put on her skis and go over to get Per Hans "This will never do," he said to his wife. "For three da and nights you haven't been out of your clothes. I may h a long time in getting over the cough." . . . He wanted t say more, but the words were lost in a paroxysm of coughin

Per Hansa and the oldest two boys were making hay twis out in the barn when Sofie brought the first news that h father had been out in the storm the other night and was no very sick. Per Hansa immediately dropped his work an went back with her. Sörine looked worn out and very muc

rried. She turned her head aside when she spoke to him, ing that things didn't look very well. Then she went to e stove, put her apron up to her eyes, and murmured again things didn't look very well! But Per Hansa's coming ered her up a little and even seemed to take away some of r anxiety. In a moment her old buoyancy had come back; e dried her eyes and asked him to follow her into the bed-om.

In a hut on the border of the Irish settlement lived an old oman who was so queer at times that she was called "Crazy idget." In fact, she had brought this name with her to e settlement; Tönseten long ago had picked it up from her untrymen, and had translated it into Norwegian—he made Kræsi-Brita. All the Norwegians called her that now. is Bridget had come west with her son, had taken the arter of land next to his, and had herself put up the hut which she now lived. Very little was known about her cept that she was extremely religious, and that as a rule e spoke a language which none of the Norwegians had ever ard before, and which, apparently, few of her own people derstood. She seldom visited the other settlers of her n accord; but many—especially those of her own race—me often to her for help in time of sickness. She had a eat store of old-fashioned remedies, both for humans and r beasts, and she gave of them freely, without pay. Most the Norwegians had consulted her at one time or another, spite of the fact that they went on saying she was only a aud. And though they said it, they all had to admit, when came down to known cases, that she had a remarkable way th sick folks.

When Per Hansa saw how seriously ill his neighbour was went out into the kitchen and said to Sörine that some one ust go and fetch Bridget. They ought not to scorn her wers at a time like this—she might be able to help; at least, ey must try every chance that offered.

Suiting the action to the word, he went for her himself. little later the old woman came trudging over on snowshoes, carrying an odd-looking bag on her back. She warme herself at the fire, went into the bedroom, and looked at th suffering man. Then she asked for a kettle and opened he bag; first she took out four large onions; these she cut int tiny bits and dumped into the kettle; then she opened a bottl of vile-smelling stuff and poured some of its contents on th onions; at last she set the kettle over the fire and let it boi awhile. From this mixture she made thick poultices, whic she put on Hans Olsa's back and chest; but before she pu them on she took out of her pocket a small rusty crucifix mumbled some words over it, and stuck it into the poultic which was to lie on his chest. As she fixed these application she made the sign of the cross over his chest and back. Al the while she was muttering strange words, in a languag they did not understand—whether a prayer or something worse they could not say. These poultices were to be kep on for twelve hours, she explained in broken English, an hot cloths must be put over them to keep them warm. Whe the twelve hours were gone they must make a fresh poultice She instructed Sörine how to make it—with onions, a cup of linseed oil, one cup of fresh milk, and some flour. They must take good care of the crucifix, she said; she would hold them responsible for it. After giving some more good advice, she wished them God's blessing, put her bag on her back, fastened her snowshoes, and trudged away.

Both Sörine and Hans Olsa had faith in the woman and were glad that she had come. . . . One must try such remedies as one had. . . .

Per Hansa was very busy that forenoon; there was much to do at his own place, and more at his neighbour's. He had hurried home from Hans Olsa's after going for Bridget; had called the two boys, and taken them with him at once to look after the cattle up north. Before he left he told Beret briefly how things were at their neighbour's, and asked her to arrange her own work so that she could go over toward evening and stay there for the night. It might be late before he could get back. . . .

At supper time Tönseten called at Per Hansa's as he was ing by. He was on his way home from the east part of e settlement, and just wanted to drop in to see how they ere after the storm. When he heard the news about Hans sa—how he had come down with such a bad cough, that was doubtful if he would pull through—he decided to go er at once and tell Sörine what to do. If anyone in these rts knew all there was to know about a cough, he was the an! Tönseten was in an extraordinarily bright humour at evening. He told Per Hansa not to worry, if it was thing worse than the cough; put on his skis and started off r Hans Olsa's.

Out in the bedroom lay the sick man, propped up by pil-ws; Little-Hans sat at the foot of the bed with his play-ings; Sörine and the daughter had finished the chores and ere now working in the kitchen; Beret sat in the bedroom, king care that the poultices were kept hot and that the tient's shoulders were covered up warm; she had her knit-ng in her hands and was singing a hymn when Tönseten me in.

On entering the room Tönseten greeted them both cheer-; but instantly he began to feel ill at ease. . . . No need, rely, to begin the funeral before the man was in the coffin! . . He managed to hold his tongue, however. Since Beret d recovered, he couldn't stand her. She had become so ous that if a fellow made the most innocent remark, she as sure to preach at him. And never a drop of whisky ould she tolerate, either for rheumatism or for cough. . . One ought to have some sense, even if one was going be religious. Surely he who was both klokker and deacon ght to be privileged to talk a little sense into her! . . . ut such was the respect which she commanded, that even ough he had thought about it for two years, he had never red to say the first word.

To-night Tönseten could think only of how serious things oked for Hans Olsa; he went straight to the bedside, and id in a tone of voice that was meant to be cheerful: "I'm surprised at you, Hans Olsa! . . . What do you mean by lying here like this, you slugabed? And here you have the finest ski-slide the Lord ever made, clear from your housetop all the way down to my place!" . . . The sick man's face brightened as he looked into Tönseten's merry eyes; a breath of fresh air flurried from out the red, icicled beard; the whole face bending above him radiated good humour. . . . "I'm glad you came, Syvert," said Hans Olsa in a faint voice.

Tönseten now began to feel that the right atmosphere had been established; he hummed a tune, took a chair, and sat down beside the bed. Without further prelude, he started to relate what had happened to him that day. . . . Yesterday morning, when Kjersti had tried to make the fire, the stove wouldn't draw and the room had filled with smoke; not being able to manage the thing, she had come and roused him. He had got up, had dressed, and had then tried to open the door only to find that the whole house was snowed under; from the hillside to the creek stretched one huge, solid drift, and the chimney itself was packed full of snow. . . .

Well, he had succeeded after a while in getting a hole through, so that at last they could have their morning coffee. It was simply terrible how much snow there was down his way. Yesterday he had been busy all day, making steps in the snow down to the house; these had packed fairly well during the day, but to-day they were as solid as ice. . . . And this morning when Kjersti had come along carrying a pail of water, she had been so unfortunate as to slip on the top step—"ha-ha!" . . . She had thrown the pail into the air, her feet had shot out from under her, and she hadn't stopped until she'd landed on her backsides in the middle of the floor! . . . "ha-ha-ha!" . . . There she sat. . . . "What in Heaven's name are you up to, Kjersti?" he had said, when he saw that she hadn't hurt herself very much; and then he naturally had gone off into a fit of laughing. This had infuriated Kjersti; and when he saw that he'd tried his damnedest to stop—but for the life of him he couldn't! He'd laughed and laughed, and the more he'd laughed the worse ings had got; until finally she had lost her temper com-etely and just driven him out of the house. . . .

Well, this is what he had done next; he had put on his skis nd gone over east in the settlement—had spent the whole ternoon there—just to visit around and see how folks were etting along. At last he had dropped in to see Johannes örstad and his wife Josie—Josie was about to have her fth child, you know, and was expecting it any day now; önseten felt compelled to keep himself posted on the inti-ate progress of that family. So he had sat there gossiping ith them a long while, and had just been telling them what ad happened at home that day, when there!—he'd burst out ughing again, and laughed so hard that they all had to join . And this had thrown Johannes into such a good humour at he had hunted up a bottle which he was saving for the oming event, and had given Tönseten a drop or two—per-aps it was three—well, it may have been four—if one must e accurate. . . . All this about the stove, and the steps, and jersti, and about how he had had to take to his heels in rder to find peace, he related in epic detail to Hans Olsa—ere seemed to be need of something jolly here! . . . But e number of drinks he really had had, he didn't fully reveal. There was something so infectious about Tönseten's good pirits that they almost coaxed Hans Olsa into a brighter ood. But then a spell of coughing came on; he choked it ck and asked if Kjersti hadn't hurt herself pretty badly?

"Oh no, boys, never you fear!" hiccoughed Tönseten, wip-g his eyes with the backs of his hands. "She's all right, xcept for a few scratches here and there in the bottom—ere and there—but they'll heal up in a little while. . . . verything grows so big and fat around here, you know!" . . Tönseten went off into such another gale of laughter at he almost fell out of his chair.

"Well, well!" . . . he said as soon as he could control mself, getting up to leave. "To-morrow I shall bring jersti over here with me. You just wait—we'll get the ough boiled out of that chest of yours! Kjersti knows how treat a cough, I can tell you!" . . .

V

Beret had stopped her singing abruptly when Tönsete came in. As he rambled on she sat and watched his face—something made her look at him in spite of herself. She listened to his half-maudlin laughter—and it seemed to her she never had realized before how disgusting his laugh was. His breath smelled of whisky. At first she felt furious with him and wanted to order him out of the house. Didn't the fool know that it was unseemly to talk that way at a death-bed? . . . But she only took her chair and moved farther off, as a child draws away from one of whom it is afraid.

When Tönseten had at last gone the air of the room seemed close and foul to Beret; filth and pollution had entered in where all should have been the serenity and holiness of a Sabbath. In a vision of startling clearness she saw how evil besmirches all life. What a degraded thing man's life on earth had become! Here was one neighbour calling on another at the point of death; if ever there was need of godly speech, it was at this moment; and yet there had been nothing but vileness in his mouth! She felt a physical desire to cleanse the place of its corruption; folding her hands, she began to sing, soft and low:

"O Jesus, see
My misery:
God's image out is blotted,
And with snow-white leprosy Sin my soul has spotted.

"Once heavenly bright
Thy own delight,
It was—a new creation;
Now, because of sin's dread blight,
Under condemnation.

"In death's dark night,
Devoid of light,
It sought to find its pleasure;
All in vain, since it did slight
God, its greatest treasure.

"No tongue can tell How low it fell
In sin's dire degradation;
By forgetting heaven and hell,
It sought consolation.

"Thus it was found
In darkness bound,
With all its powers shattered,
Led at will by Satan round,
And with filth bespattered.

"O Christ, in Thee,
Who cam'st to be
A ransom for us given,
Is our only sanctity
And our way to heaven.

"Thy mercy be
My only plea;
Thy light my soul enlighten,
That it God again may see,
And life's pathway brighten.

"Let morning rays
Of Thy mild grace
Upon my heart be streaming,
And from death my soul thus raise
By Thy love redeeming.

"O sinner's friend,
Whom thorns did lend Death's scornful coronation,
Grant me peace with God again,
And with it salvation."

She sang the whole hymn through before she got up again change the cloths; that duty done, she went out to help rine and Sofie in the kitchen.
All that night Beret sat by the bedside. Though the sick man seemed no worse, the specks of rust that he raised from the depths of his chest appeared to her to be larger and more numerous. He slept little, but she didn't wonder at that—he must have solemn things to think about now. She wanted to talk them over with him, but did not like to disturb his thoughts yet awhile. During the early part of the night they exchanged few words. But along toward morning the paroxysms of coughing became more frequent and violent; there were times when they almost choked him. Once she grew frightened and got up to hold his head; his face was turning blue as he struggled for breath; then she said, slowly, "Now I think you must prepare yourself, Hans Olsa."

He turned his head sharply and looked at her. . . . "Prepare myself?" . . .

"You will hardly be able to stand this very much longer."

The big bulk of Hans Olsa lay very quiet; only his hand was moving nervously over the cover; his eyes had a questioning, startled look. . . . "Well . . . many have got over the cough." . . . .

She did not answer him. After a while he added, thoughtfully, "It will be worse for those who are left." . . .

"You ought not to say that, Hans Olsa—their time has not yet come. But remember that for you the day of grace is nearly over." She spoke quietly and compassionately, in a tone of voice which, whenever she used it, always carried conviction by its confident faith.

For a long time Hans Olsa made no reply; he turned his face to the wall and closed his eyes. Beret stood looking at him. . . . "He does not like what I said. That's how we are, we sinners. But I am glad I said it. I don't believe he will ever get up again."

. . . "Oh, well," murmured Hans Olsa after a while. "He has had mercy on many a sinner before. I suppose there will be a little left for me, too." . . .

A great eagerness suddenly welled up in Beret's soul. . . . "If only you will bring him a contrite heart! But how can one forgive the erring child who does not repent? . . . Woe nto you that are rich!—For ye have received your consolaon. . . . Woe unto you that are full!—For ye shall hunger.

. . Woe unto you that laugh now!—For ye shall weep and ourn. . . . Oh no, we cannot only comfort ourselves with e belief that there is mercy enough—that it is free!" . . .
Vith firm hands, she changed the cloths again.

One severe coughing spell after another began to attack
m now, and nothing more was said; but after a prolonged ruggle he got his breath again; completely exhausted, he rned his face to the wall, and it looked as if he might drop f to sleep. . . . He lay perfectly quiet a long time.

Beret knit steadily until her hands grew tired; she wonered if she couldn't find something to do for Sörine, took the mp and went into the kitchen. Here she found a great pile f coarse hay stacked against the wall; she set to work at nce, making twists of it for the fire. All the while she was inking about her conversation with Hans Olsa. . . . "It ill seem strange not to meet Hans Olsa in the hereafter—at it will. In the old country we grew up together. . . .
hey are good folk, both he and she. . . . And now he is arting out on his long journey—and will not pass through e heavenly gates! . . . His mother, Ellen, was a very Godearing woman; his father I didn't know, but I never heard word against him. . . . Now they have waited there for im these many years; it will be hard for me to meet them me day and tell them how it all happened here. . . . Peraps I will be to blame, too; I certainly haven't done what I ould. . . . Oh, how can he hope to get in? Not many om the Dakota prairie will ever stand in glory there—that am sure of! . . . For here Earth takes us. What she canot get easily she wrests by subtle force, and we do not even now it. . . . I see what happens in my own home. . . . It awful! . . . Here he lay at the point of death, enjoying önseten's ribaldry! . . . With thoughts like this, he is now meet his God!" . . .

The lamp burned low. The room was growing cold. She ot up and threw some fagots into the fire, waited until it burned up briskly, then put on a couple of sticks of wood—there were not many left in the box. . . . "It will not be easy for Sörrina when he is gone. . . . But nothing else matters if only he could reach the Heavenly Home! We can take care of things here." . . .

She went into the bedroom again, to see if she could do anything for the sick man. He was awake when she came in; his manner showed that he had been waiting for her.

"How is the weather outside?" he asked, slowly. "Would it be possible for a man to travel in it?"

"What do you say?" She came close to the bed.

"Could we try to get the doctor, do you suppose? . . . Others out here have had him." . . .

"We shall see when daylight comes. . . . But how about the minister, Hans Olsa?"

"The minister?"

"Yes—when the Lord's hour is at hand, man's help is of no avail; for from His wrath no man can flee! . . . What you need most of all is Communion, Hans Olsa!"

"Communion . . . ? Well . . . yes . . . I suppose so . . . that is true."

"It is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God," said Beret, quietly, and looked into his face with sorrowful despair. "There is nothing but evil in us—yes, nothing. But when He comes to us in Holy Communion, laying His merciful hands benignantly upon us and assures us from out the Gates of Eternity that all our sins are forgiven—oh, there is no moment so great as this for the sin-burdened soul! Then we may rest in peace." . . .

Once more he turned his face away, gave a light cough, and looked fixedly at the wall. Beret felt intuitively that his cough was forced this time. . . . "How strange we are—we erring mortals! Here I stand, telling him of the truth and the light and the way. Now he is wandering in the dark—he does not know which way to go. But when I tell him, he coughs the word away! . . . Thus it is to be dead in the midst of life!"

He lay still awhile, and then he said, wearily, "All my life ıave thought it would be blessed to come Home." Tears came to Beret's eyes. . . . "But are you ready to urney on? Do you dare now to meet Him as you are? . . .
ere you have lived all these years, in error and sin, and ve not taken time to give Him any thoughts at all."
"Oh no," he sighed, heavily. . . . "But that isn't so very ange, is it?"
She felt uplifted by what she had been able to say; it gave r greater courage to go on. . . . "That's why you must k Him here, before you meet Him face to face yonder!"
e cried, exultantly. "Now I will pray for you." . . .
ithout waiting for his consent, she knelt beside the bed and gan to pray earnestly, with sweet compassion vibrating rough her mellow voice, that he who now lay here might be ven the grace to see his sin and to repent before the door d closed.
But she had hardly begun when something stopped the ayer. . . . Hans Olsa had reared himself up on his elbows ıen she had sunk to her knees beside the bed, and had reained in this position, staring at her wide-eyed. As he ard how she pleaded for him he was seized with a sudden nvulsion of coughing; he sat up frantically in bed, gasping r breath. The bedclothes fell off him, the poultices slipped wn, and Beret had to leave her praying to attend to him.
ıd when he was quiet again he asked to have his milk ırmed; then he had to get up; from that he got an attack chills, and Beret had to call Sörine to help her warm the ths once more and tuck him in.
With the first grey light of dawn Johannes Mörstad ared, begging and begging that Beret go with him—Josie ıs coming down; he had tried to get Kjersti, but she had ned herself so badly the other day, that it was impossible r her to walk that far. . . . "This is certainly the work of e devil!" thought Beret. "Just now . . . !" But she went t of the house full of the same great exaltation, like one ıose sins had been laid bare before the whole congretion. . . .

VI

A little while later Per Hansa dropped in to see how the were getting along. He said that he would arrange with th Solum boys to help him carry hay and water to the herd u north; that done, he would go to Gjermund Dahl's, to ge him to come and help Sörine with the chores. This evenin he would come back to make a report about everything. Nov he must be gone. . . .

People were hard at work throughout the whole settle ment; the weather continued threatening, and there was muc to be done after the storm; hogs and cattle, as well as huma beings, had to be safeguarded against another onslaught o winter. On most of the farms the outhouses were still o primitive construction, built either of sod or of poles an straw. The last storm had buried some of them entirely from others it had stripped off the straw so completely, tha the tops of the poles poking through the snowdrifts re sembled nothing so much as bleached bones sticking out o the ground. Of some of the farmhouses only the roof could be seen; of the sod huts, only the chimneys; down a Tönseten's, the smoke came right out of a hole in the snow bank. If one wanted to go to his neighbour's, he had to pu on skis or snowshoes, and keep on top of the drifts. There were homes where no other food was left than dry corn and the little milk that the cows gave. On the outskirts of the settlement, where the latest newcomers lived, they sometimes didn't even have that much. But the people there would borrow a sack of wheat from anybody who had one; and if they had no coffee mill in the house, they would use a mortar, or improvise one from a kettle. Folks were cheerful about helping one another in those days. What one didn't have, he borrowed; if one got a new idea, he passed it on to his neigh bours. The scarcity of fuel caused the most suffering, for hay burned like hay, even if twisted.

Tönseten was sitting in the bedroom at Hans Olsa's when Per Hansa came back after supper. He was down-hearted and quiet to-day. Kjersti had been in bed most of the time ause of the stiffness and soreness from her fall; and she s so cross, he explained, that if a fellow as much as looked her she would bite his head off. He had had the devil to , with taking care of both her and himself and doing chores besides. . . . As he noticed how flushed Hans sa's face was and heard how he struggled for breath, he ndered if his own cough had ever been as bad as this. If s was worse than he had had it three years ago, the man uld never be able to throw it off. . . . But he kept the ught to himself.

Things had been in a bad way with Hans Olsa all that ; the coughing spells had come oftener; he had been rest- s and fretful; had asked first for one thing, and then for ther, and was always inquiring about the weather. At t moment he happened to be quiet; when all at once he gan to talk about the inevitable. . . . He asked both of his ghbours to help Sörine when he was gone, and to give her ir best advice about running the farm, just as he would ve done for them, if either one of them had been in his ce. . . . "Per Hansa, stay with me to-night! Sörrina st have some sleep; she has had all the work to do out- rs, and needs some rest. It may take a long time with me —perhaps we shall need help from all of you!"

Thus it came about that Per Hansa watched with him that ght. Sörine lay down in the other room, fully dressed. e door between the rooms stood open. She intended to ze only a minute and not lose herself so completely that e couldn't jump up to help when the worst spells came on; t she had tramped about working in the snow nearly all y, and was so worn out that she soon dropped off into a nd sleep.

After all had been quiet in the house for some time, Hans sa looked up and asked, in a needlessly loud voice, if his fe was asleep. When no answer came from the other m, he lay still for quite a while, gazing up with his eyes ed on space; then he began, in a calm, matter-of-fact way, tell Per Hansa how he thought everything ought to be anged after he was gone. He mentioned first a couple of little debts which he had in Sioux Falls; then he spoke c several of the new settlers who owed him for seed and cattl and stipulated how much each was to pay. It transpired late that in every case he had stated less than what was owing t him. . . . Sörine ought to hold the farm and keep on livin here; for this was the country of the future—of that he wa certain. Per Hansa would hereafter have to be her chie counsellor; if he could hire an honest and capable manage for her, she and the children would get along all right. . . And then there was Little-Hans—it was hard to go away an not see what this seedling of manhood would grow up int If he showed any aptitude for his books, they would have t send him to St. Olaf College. . . . Or if the Lord ha destined him for the ministry— But that was probabl expecting too much. . . .

He talked with great difficulty. Every now and then h had to stop for breath. Per Hansa only nodded his replies all he could think of to say was: "Don't worry. . . . Is ther anything else now? . . . I will take care of everything."

Little by little Per Hansa got the feeling that his frien had something on his mind; he could not tell exactly wh he felt that way, but the impression grew stronger an stronger. Every time a pause came over the sick man's tall he expected to hear what it was. But there seemed to b nothing more. At last Hans Olsa fell silent; he was sti looking straight ahead of him; but now he began to be ver restless. A violent fit of coughing shook his frame. Fro out that great chest of his came a dreadful wheezing, gratin sound, as from an old pair of leaky bellows when they ar blown up hard.

When the cough had eased itself, Hans Olsa began onc more his frightened groping among the things of the future but now he spoke less coherently. After midnight he had quiet spell when he lay as if exhausted and said nothing; bu off and on he would glance at his neighbour out of the corne of his eyes; there was something unusual and urgent in th look—something that made a man afraid. . . . Per Hans wondered if the end were at hand. . . .

But suddenly the sick man began to talk again. It was rdly what Per Hansa had expected to hear. He merely sed his eyes and asked in a low voice:

"Is the snow very deep?"

"Between our farms," said Per Hansa, "it doesn't lie less an four feet anywhere; and it's as deep as that on the level over the prairie. Down near the creek, by Tönseten's, it ıst be as much as twenty feet deep! . . . It snowed just ittle, I want you to know!"

"Is it as bad as that?" . . . The sick man sighed heavily, hands fidgeting with the covers; then he repeated in a v voice: "So—is it as deep as that?"

"Was there something on your mind?"

"Then it isn't possible to get anywhere!" . . . The power- jaws closed; drops of sweat stood out on the great, shiny ce.

Per Hansa's heart stirred with a nameless dread; he felt ıself grow dizzy, but he cleared his throat and said, mly:

"What is it that you want, Hans Olsa? . . . Do you want doctor?"

The sick man turned toward him.

"Oh—it's the minister I need!" . . . Then, after a mo- ent, he added: "But don't you think the weather will be tter in a day or two?" . . .

He lay perfectly still. When he got no answer he looked and repeated, imploringly:

"Don't you think so?"

Per Hansa rose to his feet and began pacing back and forth oss the floor. It must be very close in here . . . he felt faint. Thinking of how it was outdoors, he suddenly ınd himself bathed in perspiration. . . . God pity him who l to travel the prairie these days!

He came back to the bed.

"You feel that you must have him?"

"It is terrible to fall into the hands of the living God!" . The large, kindly features were drawn and trembling, h fear of the unknown. Per Hansa could scarcely endure it to look at him; he had to lean against the back of a chai for support. . . . In broken words, his friend repeated: "I is terrible . . . terrible . . . to fall . . . into His hands!" . .

"Hush, now! Hush, now, man! Don't talk blasphemy! cried Per Hansa. "Lie down, now. . . . See here . . . th covers are falling off you!"

The bulky form had reared itself violently up in bed Through a paroxysm of coughing Hans Olsa whimpered:

"Tell Sörrina to come here!"

It looked for a moment as if he were passing away in th midst of the attack. Hans Olsa himself thought so. In wil alarm, Per Hansa resorted to pounding the sick man's back just as one does with children when they have swallowed th wrong way. But after a while the spell gradually left him as the others had done. He settled back, and a little late fell into a deep sleep, which lasted till morning.

The first rays of daylight woke Sörine. Her husband wa already awake by that time, and seemed better. Per Hans put on his coat and prepared to go; he had all his own wor to do at home, besides Hans Olsa's cattle up north to loo after.

Hans Olsa watched him get ready, following all his move ments with a pathetic sadness like that which stands in dog's eyes when he watches his master go away without him Then he called him over to the bedside and asked him agai what the weather was like. There was an odd little quive in his voice as he said, almost as though he were ashamed

"I suppose it's still impossible to get anywhere?"

Per Hansa felt like laughing at such childishness in grown-up man; he scarcely knew what to answer. Bu answer he must; so he braced himself, buttoned his big coa put on his mittens, and said, firmly: "You ought to lie sti and sleep awhile longer, Hans Olsa. . . . During the nigh you slept like a rock—and see how much better you are al ready! . . . I promise you that I'll be back some time late in the day."

"You don't think it can be done?"

Nameless dread again seized Per Hansa. He stepped bac

d said, hastily: "Calm yourself now, Hans Olsa! . . . 'e'll have to see about it—you understand."

The sick man reached out toward him, caught his hand d held it tightly, with something of his old strength. . . . Oh, Per Hansa!" he cried. . . . "There never was a man ke you . . . !" and fell back on the pillow, exhausted.

VII

All through the latter part of last summer and early fall er Hansa had done a full man's work plus a bit more; nor d he spared the boys, either. And he had hired a number men besides. He needed all the help he could get; for ere was the new house to be built, the crops to be harvested, e fall plowing that must be done, and in addition, all the her work about the farm.

But he had gone about his duties in a mood that made any sk easy both for himself and for those who worked with m. His wife's improved condition had relieved him of hole loads of worry and anxiety. During the years that her ind had been beclouded he had treated her as a father would delicate, frail child that, by some inexcusable fault on his rt, had been reduced to helplessness. So solicitous had en his watchful care over her through all these years, that is paternal attitude had become fixed with him. Even now at she was well again, it didn't change.

Her growing religious concern didn't alarm him; that, too, took as a notion on the part of a frail child. He either ould meet her admonitions with silence, or else laugh kindly her eagerness, or he might throw himself into the work all e harder. The fact that she now was quite all right again, at he no longer needed to watch over her in constant dread, ut that she, on the contrary, could take care of the house a capable way and even find time to help with the outside ork, was a constant source of thankfulness to him. To him e was still the delicate child that needed a father's watchful e. To desire her physically would be as far from his mind the crime of incest.

Shortly before the Christmas holidays they had had a set-to over religion. She had insisted that he as the father of the family should conduct daily devotion. At this demand he had laughed, not unkindly but humorously, as if she had sprung a good joke on him. . . . He conducting devotion—the idea! She had become insistent; her voice was full of deep sorrowful concern over his seemingly total depravity. She had entreated him earnestly and yet so kindly that he, too, was touched. And so he had said, as one yields to an unreasonable whim of a dear child, that that he would not do, but he would be glad to have her do it, for she could read so beautifully, which was true. Feeling that it would be dangerous to his temper to argue the matter any longer, he had gone out of the house to find some work outside. From that time on she had been conducting devotion each day, but both of them had studiously avoided a new discussion, with the result that the relation between them was less frank than before; each seemed to feel the guardedness of the other.

As time passed her devotional exercises became less and less pleasing to him; at times they would get on his nerves. In the prayers she began to offer there would creep in more and more of concern for him; and little by little it got to be almost exclusively for him. As he sat there listening it sounded to him as if he were the most hardened sinner in all Christendom; he would feel ashamed before the children, would find some pretext to steal out of the house. But he couldn't bring it across his heart to speak to her; for how can one reason with a child that is so delicate as she, he thought.

In the grey light of dawn Per Hansa returned from the bedside of Hans Olsa, looking like a man who had reached the end of his rope. He hung up his coat and hat and sat down at the table in the large kitchen to eat his breakfast. Off and on he glanced out of the window. While Beret brought him his food, she asked how things were over at Hans Olsa's. At first she got very little satisfaction; his answers were short and taciturn, and he seemed engrossed in his own thoughts. He ate slowly and took a long time er the meal; all the while he kept looking out of the ndow.

At length he got up from the table, crossed to the stove, rned his back to it, and put his hands behind him, as though still felt cold and needed the warmth of the fire. . . . Vell," he said, meditatively, "I suppose he doesn't expect get over this sickness—and it's more than likely he won't. e just lies there and whimpers about having the minister. . There's something uncanny about him. I can't under- nd it at all." . . . These remarks were not directed at eret; he stood looking straight ahead of him, as if thinking oud. Beret had stopped working when she heard him; r face lighted up as she answered, with an unmistakable ng of exultation in her voice: "But I can understand it! . Now may God be near and hear his prayer! Some one ust go for the minister at once."

Per Hansa did not move; he was staring off into space. eret crossed the floor, her hands full of dishes, and stopped rectly in front of him. . . . "You must persuade some one go with you. This is terrible weather! . . . Could you going on horseback?"

"Huh—horseback! How you talk!"

"But it is an awful thing for a soul to be cast into hell nen human beings can prevent it!"

Per Hansa seemed amused at this idea. "Well, if Hans sa is bound in that direction, there'll be a good many more om here in the same boat! . . . He'll land in the right ace, don't worry."

The words sounded so blasphemous to Beret that she could t repress a shudder of horror. Greatly wrought up, she the dishes down on the table and said, fiercely: "You ow what our life has been: land and houses, and then ore land, and cattle! That has been his whole concern— at's been his very life. Now he is beginning to think about t having laid up treasures in heaven. . . . Can't you derstand that a human being ever becomes concerned over s sins and wants to be freed from them?"

"I suppose I don't understand anything, do I?" said Per

Hansa in a tone of disgust. "Perhaps I don't understand for instance—though God knows it would not be difficu for any grown person to see it—that no man could cross th prairie from here to the James River, as things are now, an come out alive— . . . As for Hans Olsa, the Lord will fin him good enough, even without either minister or klokker— that I truly believe!"

"The God of this world hath blinded the minds of ther which believe not! . . . Here lies one who is about to receiv his sight, and we will not reach out a hand to help him!"

"Hold your tongue, Beret!" cried Per Hansa, sharply anger at the hopelessness of the argument getting the bette of him. "Do you want to drive me out into the jaws o death?"

"What horrible things you say, Per Hansa!"

"Horrible—well! Don't you suppose the good Lord would have provided other weather if he had intended me to make this trip?"

She gave him a quick look.

"It's possible to try, isn't it?" she said with cold persistence. "Why can't you get some one to go with you? You could take Indi—he is light-footed, and we could wrap things around all four legs, so that he wouldn't sink through the snow. They say that has been done before—I've read about it. . . . Henry has a sleigh; and you could turn back at any time, if you couldn't make it. . . . The Lord would forgive us then for what we couldn't possibly do—if we had tried!"

"He had better do that right now!" growled Per Hansa, a gust of hot anger nearly choking him. Without another word he went to the stairs, called Ole and Store-Hans, and told them to get into their clothes right away. Pulling on his coat, he slammed out of the house to do the morning chores.

Beret looked at the door through which he had just disappeared. . . . There he leaves in a fit of temper, fuming and cussing! . . . She took up the morning work, her thoughts busy with many things. Before she realized it she as absorbed in what had so often been on her mind lately: That had happened to him, anyway? What had made him different? . . . His warm playfulness, his affectionate nderness—what had become of it? . . . Oh no, no! she ught herself, how can I be thinking of such things again! he sweet desires of the flesh are the nets of Satan. . . . ow deeply sin has besoiled all life! . . . Beret went about er work with a greater determination; but her sad mood did ot lift.

A hundred things were waiting for Per Hansa outside, ut he was so angry that he scarcely noticed what he was out. . . . The world seemed upside down to-day. . . . hat grown people couldn't see an inch beyond their noses! ere lay Hans Olsa, driving himself out of his mind because couldn't have a minister—when there was no better man an himself in all Christendom! . . . And here was Beret sisting that he leap right into the arms of death—she who ad a heart so tender that she couldn't harm a mouse! . . . eople could certainly twist things around in a queer way! ll his life he had worked and slaved in order that she and e children might be made comfortable . . . and now it was ung in his face and he was taunted with being only a blind ole who saw nothing but the hole he had burrowed him-lf into! . . . "By God, it's a strange world we live in!" . . If this went on much longer, he would go out of his ind himself—if he wasn't a little crazy already! . . . He ashed from one thing to another in a frenzy, leaving every-ing half done.

When the boys came out they all put on their skis and arted across the snowdrifts to Hans Olsa's north quarter. he day was bleak; a cold air was drawing in from the west. o Store-Hans, all these fields of snow were glorious; now e could skim like a bird over the drifts. Little by little er Hansa forgot his temper as he caught the infection of ie boy's exuberant joy.

While they were working over the cattle, Per Hansa talked a steady stream to the boys. All this snow, he said, romised a bumper crop next summer—you could depend on that! . . . One of his moods of high good humour had come over him now with a rush; and as was customary with him in that frame of mind, he discussed things with the boys as if they had been grown men. He outlined at length how they could manage their place in order to have the very finest of farms. If all went well, they would build a big barn next fall; but they certainly wouldn't be such damned idiots as to build a horse barn and cow barn separate, as that fool Torkel Tallaksen had done! It made a fine show, all right, but it was hardly practical; besides costing a good deal more, the barns were cold. . . . But they were going to have a real show barn, just the same—red with white cornices, because he always thought those colors looked the best. . . . Then he told them how he had read in the Skandinaven [1] that the big farmers in the East now built a track under the ridgepole, along which they hauled the hay right into the barn loft. They would have to investigate this idea, for it sounded practical. . . . They found plenty to do up north; they saw to it that the cattle had water and hay enough; they carried in more straw; they stuffed the cracks in the walls; and all the while they talked and worked together like three grown men. Per Hansa felt the need of throwing off the great burden that weighed him down; and for the moment he seemed to be succeeding fairly well. But at last they had finished everything that needed to be done; then the skis went on in a hurry, and off flew the boys like two great sea gulls soaring across the fiord. . . . No more time for talk! They struck off directly for the highest hill in sight; from there they could slide all the way down to the creek. . . . Wasn't it wonderful . . . all this snow!

Just as Per Hansa reached the yard at home Sörine was coming out of the kitchen door; she went over to the wall of the house, took a pair of skis that stood there, and put them on. He noticed that she was very thinly clad. She had a shawl over her head, but wore no other outdoor wrap. He concluded at once that she must have left home in a hurry, and feared that the worst had happened. . . . Was anything

[1] Norwegian-American newspaper published in Chicago.

rong? he asked. . . . No, Hans Olsa didn't seem much orse; she thought he looked a little better. But her face as sad and she looked down as she spoke. . . . Bridget had en to see him again and had said there was no hope. . . . And I guess there isn't, either," she went on. "But I had come over and ask your advice, Per Hansa. . . . He said at you were going after the minister for him. And I suppose that might be a good thing to do; at any rate, he is very appy about it. . . . But now, of course, I see that it's mpossible to go anywhere. . . . Still, I was thinking that you did intend to try, it might be better to get the doctor stead. . . . I don't suppose you can think of it in this eather, but I had to come over, anyway. . . ." Not once d she look up as the obvious pleading went on.

Per Hansa glanced down at his skis. Her voice had a in, timid sound in this piercing wind. He felt the cold mself and remembered how thinly she was clad.

"You must stay awhile and get warm before you go," he id, quietly.

"No, I must hurry home. I know I shouldn't have come, ut—" her voice suddenly left her. In a moment it came ack, and then she went on, bravely: "It is so hard to see m go, without being able to help! And then we all have feeling that nothing is ever impossible for you—and I ought that perhaps you might find a way out of this, too!" . . All at once her pleading had taken on a frantic urgency. "Did he ask you to come to me?"

"No—he didn't exactly do that. But he kept wondering you weren't getting ready—if you wouldn't be starting on. I could see plainly enough that he wanted some one come over."

Per Hansa said nothing more, nor did he look at her again. he went away at once. When she had gone, he took off his is, beat the snow from them, and set them up against the all. But he did not go in immediately. . . . His thoughts llowed her who was now walking across the snow, passed r, entered the house before her, saw his friend lying there saw the great face staring up at him, the frightened eyes imploring him like those of a kindly dog. He stood still in his tracks a long time, gazing off into vacancy, without the will to move. . . .

On the kitchen floor Permand was playing at threshing. When the father came in he hailed him, giving off orders like a man: "Come here and help me, you; we've got to get this work done before evening!" The boy's heart and soul were in his play. Seeing that dinner was not yet ready, the father hung up his coat and hat and sat down on the floor beside his son. In a moment they were both absorbed in the play.

During the meal the two parents scarcely spoke to each other, and never once did their eyes meet. As soon as they had finished the boy came and wanted his father to play with him some more; the father willingly agreed, and soon they were hard at it again. It was a serious question as to how they could get a lot of threshing done to-day; all the while they were laughing and talking about it, making a great deal of noise.

As the mother cleared the table she kept looking at them in wonder and dismay. . . . Here he sat and played with the child, just as if there were nothing serious in the world for him. The day was wearing on. Didn't he really intend to try to do anything? She could have cried aloud in her anguish! Had he become stone blind? . . . When she had finished washing the dishes she went to the window and stood there awhile, looking out; then she crossed to the wall where her outdoor clothes hung, and began to put them on. This attracted Per Hansa's attention.

. . . Was she going out? he asked.

. . . Yes. . . . She put on one of his coats over her own wrap, then pulled his big stocking cap over her head.

He looked up a second time.

"Are you going far? You seem to be wrapping up a good deal."

She waited a moment before she answered.

"I have to talk to Henry. . . . Some one must go on this rand for Hans Olsa!" Her face was flushed with termination and her eyes shone with a quiet light.

Per Hansa burst into a laugh and scrambled to his feet. "You'll have to behave yourself now, woman," he said, e a man trying to talk reason into a naughty child. "You ght to know that this is no weather for a woman to be out "

"It's no weather for men to be out in, either, by the way looks in here!"

He whirled on her suddenly, his face white with passion; e eyes that stared at her fiercely, burned with a lambent me.

"God help me!" she thought. "Now he's going to lay nds on me! . . . But I only spoke the truth!"

"I want no more damned nonsense about this!" he burst t, hoarsely. "If you . . . if you have something to say Henry, you'll have to say it here in this house. . . . You n't go chasing from farm to farm to-day!" . . .

Before she knew it he had gone out of the kitchen.

VIII

In front of the steps stood the forward part of a sleigh, which the boys had tried to haul hay to the house; it was clumsy, homemade affair, so heavy that the boys couldn't dge it after it had stood awhile, and so they had left it here it was. Per Hansa had noticed it earlier in the day, d it had angered him at the time to think that the boys ere so careless. . . . When he came out now this object as the first thing he saw. He rushed at it; wrenched it out the snow with a violent jerk, and flung it so hard into a ift that only one runner remained in sight.

"There! . . . God damn the thing!" he muttered.

With that passionate outburst his temper seemed suddenly have left him; but his face was still very pale. His skis ned up against the wall where he had placed them; he put em on and stood still for a moment, lost in thought; then, ff in hand, he started off. . . .

In the east part of the settlement lived two Telemarking[1] boys, who had come over a couple of years before. They were skilled skismiths; last winter each one had made himself a pair with straps and staffs, the finest ever seen in this part of the country. This year they had made two trips to town on them before Christmas. . . . It was to these boys that Per Hansa now went. In about an hour he returned with one pair of skis on his shoulders, and another on his feet. Neither pair was his own.

Beret, greatly agitated by her husband's hasty departure, walked back and forth across the kitchen floor. . . . "Now I have brought things to a sorry pass!" she thought. "I know I said too much—but what could I do? Some one has to go, and I had no one else to ask." . . . When she saw him returning with the skis she felt relieved. . . . "It's sensible of him to go on skis; it's the only way he can possibly get along. . . . I wonder who he intends to take along with him? He ought to have thought of the plan more seriously this morning; the boys and I could have managed with the chores. . . . I must hurry up and make him a cup of coffee; he must have something hot to drink before he leaves. . . . They'll hardly get far to-day." . . . She put the coffeepot on the stove and began to set the table. . . . "I guess I'll put on a tablecloth to make things nice for him. . . . He mustn't think that I hold any hard feelings." . . .

The oldest two boys were busy digging a tunnel from the cow barn to the pigsty—the latter had been completely snowed under. Per Hansa went over there first; he talked to them as if he were in no hurry, and when it seemed to him that they were losing interest, he went down into the tunnel where they were. . . . He said that now he was going away, and that it was uncertain when he would return. Could he depend on them to look after things while he was gone? . . . The boys were absorbed in their task and didn't pay much attention to what he said. Certainly he could go. They would look after everything. They went on with their work, and soon fell into a quarrel about how long it would take hem to reach the pigsty. . . . He left the boys, took his kis, and went into the granary; there he rubbed one pair f skis with some tallow which he kept for the purpose, and ut a piece of the tallow into his pocket. He also had to djust the straps a little before he could start. . . .

[1] People from the mountain district of Telemarken, Norway.

While he was doing this Peder Victorious came trudging n and announced that mother had made coffee. She said ather must come in before it got cold.

"What?" . . . Per Hansa's face brightened. "Did mother eally say that?"

"She said coffee was ready."

"Oh! . . ."

Per Hansa had now adjusted the straps as he wanted hem, and stood looking around for a rope with which to rap the other pair of skis on his back.

"Did she send you out and tell you to say that?" . . .

"She said—she said—coffee was ready, she said!"

The father looked at his son. "You haven't got enough n, Permand," he said in a low, tender voice, stroking the oy's cheek with his hand and running his finger down into he soft warm neck. The boy screamed when it tickled. 'er Hansa laughed to hear him. "Hm—hm—cold as an icle! Pack yourself in this minute! . . . So mother has he coffee ready, you say?"

He carried the boy out lovingly, set him down with a ngering touch, and went back after his skis. One pair he ed to his back; the other he put on.

The boy waited, watching him.

"Aren't you coming, father?"

"Get into the house with you!" the father said with mock everity. "I'll probably be along in a little while." . . . Then, as he straightened up and put on his mittens, he uddenly remembered something:

"Permand!"

"Ya?" . . .

"There's a ball of nice twine in the bedroom. Ask mother o find it and give it to you to play with. . . . And now you must be a good boy, and get a lot of threshing done before I come back!"

"Yes, father," said the boy as he trotted away.

Per Hansa stood motionless, watching him until he had passed from sight inside the house. Then, with a staff in either hand, he started off. . . . Was that a face at the window that he saw? . . .

He did not look at the house again. In a moment he had passed the place where the boys were digging the tunnel; he longed to talk with them once more, but crushed the feeling down. . . . He struck out westward. Something tugged and pulled at his heart, trying to make him turn back; it was as if he had a bridle on and the driver were pulling hard on one of the reins. He had to bend his head forward against this unseen force in order to hold his direction. . . . "No—not now—not now. . . ." he murmured, bitterly, wiping his mitten across his eyes.

In the kitchen window Beret stood watching him; her soft, kindly eyes grew large and questioning. . . . Wasn't he coming in? Had Permand forgotten to tell him? . . . Surely, surely, he would come. She had fixed things so nicely for him. . . . Oh, this would never do! She must find out at once who was going with him! . . . She hurried to the door, flung it open, ran out on the steps, and tried to call to him—he simply mustn't leave this way! . . . But he had already gone beyond the range of her voice; the westerly gusts, driving full against her, snatched her words away. Her eyes filled with tears, so that she could scarcely see him now. Furious blasts came swirling out of the grey, boundless dusk, sweeping the snow in stinging clouds, whirling it round and round, dropping it only to pick it up again. Per Hansa soon disappeared in the whirling waste. . . . The wind was so cold that it penetrated to the very marrow of her bones.

A little later Per Hansa turned in at Hans Olsa's; he sat and talked with them awhile in the bedroom. Their words were few and far between. Per Hansa felt that there was nothing more for him to do here. At length he got up and id that now he was going—what sort of a trip he would ıve he did not know. If luck were with him, he would ing back the minister. In the meantime Hans Olsa must ehave himself and rest as much as possible, for he really ıd nothing to worry about. . . . The sick man groped for er Hansa's hand, and did not seem to want to let it go. e acted like a child who has teased and teased until it has ıally got its way. . . .

"I didn't dare to ask you right out," he said, as if in xplanation. "But I knew you would go as soon as it was ossible—that's always been the way with you. . . . Now I ın sleep in comfort." . . .

Out in the kitchen Sörine sat waiting at the table; when ıe heard this she hurried to pour the coffee, intending to ake him sit down and have a cup before he left.

"Must I have coffee here too? . . . No, no," he said, rking up his head. "I've had enough for to-day!" . . .

With these words he went out.

He put on his skis, straightened himself up, and remained anding there for some time; as he pulled on his mittens : took one glance homeward. He could just make out the ouse in the dim distance. Then the whiteness all around thickened—rose up in a cloud—seemed to be piling in. Whirls of snow flew high over the housetop—sometimes the ouse itself disappeared. . . . He sighed deeply, brushed his es with his mitts, and started on his way.

He took his bearings from familiar outlines of the landape, and laid the course he thought he ought to follow. . . Perhaps it wasn't so dangerous, after all. The wind ıd been steady all day, had held in the same quarter, and ould probably keep on. . . . Oh, well—here goes! . . .

He thought no more about his course for a while; but stead he began to wonder if he had done wrong in not oing in to drink the coffee, when Beret had taken all the ouble to make it. . . . "Now she'll go around feeling unppy, just because I am so touchy; and she'll be so melanoly that she'll have little patience with the boys. . . . Such high-spirited colts need to be managed with a careful hand. She doesn't understand that at all!" . . . Thoughts of home continued to come, warm and tender; he laughed softly at them. . . . "You may be sure she'll get Permand to remember me in his prayers to-night, if he doesn't think of it himself. . . . It would be fun to listen to them!" . . .

He moved slowly on with steady strokes, taking note of the wind at odd times. The picture would not leave him . . . "It would be fun just to look in on them. . . . Oh, Permand, Permand! Something great must come of you—you who are so tenderly watched over!" . . .

The swirling dusk grew deeper. . . . Darkness gathered fast. . . . More snow began to fall. . . . Whirls of it came off the tops of the drifts, circled about, and struck him full in the face. . . . No danger—the wind held steady. . . . At home all was well . . . and now mother was saying her evening prayers with Permand. . . . Move on!—Move on! . . .

IX

About halfway across the stretch from Colton to the James River a cluster of low hills rear themselves out of the prairie. Here and there among them a few stray settlers had already begun to dig in.

On one of the hillsides stood an old haystack which a settler had left there when he found out that the coarse bottom hay wasn't much good for fodder. One day during the spring after Hans Olsa had died, a troop of young boys were ranging the prairies, in search of some yearling cattle that had gone astray. They came upon the haystack, and stood transfixed. On the west side of the stack sat a man, with his back to the mouldering hay. This was in the middle of a warm day in May, yet the man had two pairs of skis along with him; one pair lay beside him on the ground, the other was tied to his back. He had a heavy stocking cap pulled well down over his forehead, and large mittens on his ands; in each hand he clutched a staff. . . . To the boys, it ooked as though the man were sitting there resting while e waited for better skiing. . . .

. . . His face was ashen and drawn. His eyes were set oward the west.

THE END

Bibliography

ÖLVAAG, O. E.

Forviklinger" (short story), Vor Tid, Minneapolis, Minn., 1907.

Amerika-Breve, 184 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1912.

Hvitbjörn Og Graabjörn" (short story), Symra, Decorah, Iowa, 1913.

Gammel Arv" (short story), Decorah-Posten, Decorah, Iowa, 1914.

Paa Glemte Veie, 286 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1914.

Deklamationsboken, 302 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1918.

Norsk Läsebok I, 339 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1919.

Norsk Läsebok II, 461 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1920.

To Tullinger, 240 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1920.

Kildahl Ved St. Olaf" (essay), Dr. John Nathan Kildahl, En Mindebok utgit ved R. Malmin, Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1921.

Klare Morgen og Vaate Kveld" (short story), Jul i Vesterheimen, Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1921.

Längselens Baat, 368 pp., Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1921.

Omkring Fädrearven (a volume of essays), 200 pp., St. Olaf College Press, Northfield, Minn., 1922.

De der Vest og vi her Öst" (essay), Tidens Tegn, Oslo, Norway, March 22, 1924.

Bibliography

I De Dage (Book I of Giants In The Earth), 237 pp., Aschehoug & Co., Oslo, Norway, 1924.

"Trönderjenten som fik hjertefeil" (short story), Jul i Vesterheimen, Augsburg Publishing House, Minneapolis, Minn., 1925.

"De Kloke Jomfruer" (short story), Julen, Oslo, Norway, 1925.

Riket Grundlägges (Book II of Giants In The Earth), 206 pp., Aschehoug & Co., Oslo, Norway, 1925.

"Professor Julius E. Olson, A Preacher of Idealism" (essay), Scandinavian Studies And Notes, Vol. VIII, No. 8, Lawrence, Kansas, 1925.

"When a Novelist Is In A Hurry" (essay), idem, Vol. IX, No. 3, 1926.

"Sangen Om Bölgene" (lyric poem), Sönner av Norges Julenummer, New York, 1926.

"In Memoriam" (essay), St. Olaf College Bulletin, Vol. XXIII, Northfield, Minn., June, 1927.

Giants In The Earth, 465 pp., Harper & Brothers, New York, 1925.

"The Genesis of Giants In The Earth" (essay), The Editor, New York, August 6, 1927.

Peder Seier, 361 pp., Aschehoug & Co., Oslo, Norway, 1928.

"Hevnen hörer mig til, Siger—" (short story), Julen, Oslo, Norway, 1928.

Peder Victorious, 350 pp., Harper & Brothers, New York, 1929.

"Vikings Of The Middle West" (essay), The American Magazine, October, 1929.

COLCORD, LINCOLN

Introduction to Giants In The Earth.

"Rölvaag The Fisherman Shook His Fist At Fate," The American Magazine, March, 1928.

COMMAGER, HENRY

"The Literature Of The Pioneer West," Minnesota History, St. Paul, Minn., December, 1927.

2705 5 568